pose obstacles to the performance of that duty. As to the age, residence, color, moral character, race, and perhaps sex, of the person, the constitution is supreme, but not so with reference to the place. Could the people of Michigan turn the place of voting into an element of qualification section four of article one of the Constitution of the United States would be rendered nugatory. Should the Congress of the United States, for the sake of uniformity, or for other sufficient reasons, fix the day of election of Representatives throughout the entire country on the first Monday of October, and also determine the places of elections, then could the several States designate other days and places and declare such days and places elements of the qualification of the electors, they might thereby preclude every man in the United States from voting for Representative in Congress, and, as a consequence, absolutely prevent an organization of the House. The States cannot, by evasion, or by indirection, or by a ridiculous employment of language, defeat the intention of the people of the United States, plainly expressed in their organic law. In truth, section four of article one of the Federal Constitution is in the nature of a proviso, or a limitation of the power of the State, to determine the qualification of electors. The legal effect would not be different had it declared, in so many words, "the people of the States may determine the qualification of electors, provided, however, the place of voting shall be no part of such qualification." If the State can make the place of voting a part of the qualification, then she can, at all times and under all circumstances, control the places of elections, the wishes and laws of Congress and the Constitution of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

But it is alleged that the question under consideration has been decided favorably for the claim of the contestant by the supreme court of the State of Michigan. I must beg leave to express the opinion that the assertion is founded in error. I do not understand that it has ever been discussed before that tribunal, or even brought before that court in any form whatever. The case relied upon as establishing the principle for which contestant contends is that of Twitchell vs. Blodgett, which involved the constitutionality of the soldiers' voting law growing out of the election of a prosecuting attorney for the county of Washtenaw, and the question was limited to the constitutionality of the act with reference to the election of officers created by the State. Neither the Constitution of the United States nor the qualification of electors were drawn in question. Lest I should be mistaken in this assertion, I will let each of the judges constituting a majority of the court speak for himself. Mr. Justice Christiancy says:

"With these preliminary observations I proceed to an examination of the specific question involved in the present case. Does the constitution prohibit the Legislature from authorizing, as they purport to have done by this act, the qualified electors of this State who may be in the military service of this State or of the United States, to vote for officers of the State and national Government, at any other place than the township in which they respectively reside, and while they are absent from such township?"

Mr. Justice Cooley states the question thus:

"This law is claimed to be unconstitutional, because, it is said, the latter part of the section above quoted from the constitution requires the personal presence of the elector in the township or ward in which he resides at the time of asserting his right to vote."

Judge Campbell says:

"And we are only concerned, therefore, in determining whether the constitution of Michigan has prevented the State Legislature from exercising complete control over the locality of elections, and whether, if such control is limited, the limitation is applicable to the subject before us."

These extracts from the opinions of the judges of the court show very clearly what was the "specific" question before them. It was not one growing out of the election of a Federal officer. It was not one touching the power of the Legislature under the Constitution of the United States. The court did not attempt an exposition of the qualifications of electors.

Indeed, the qualification of the class of voters under consideration was assumed by the court as an undisputed fact. Thus, in the extract already quoted, Judge Christiancy inquires:

"Does the constitution prohibit the Legislature from authorizing, as they purport to have done by this act, the qualified electors of this State who may be in the military service?" &c.

The court simply decide that the constitution of the State restrains the Legislature from passing a law to enable a qualified elector to vote for members of the Legislature and State and county officers at a place out of his township or ward.

Misapprehension of the true import of this quotation from the opinion of Judge Christiancy seems to have led the contestant into error in another respect. He infers that the court has discussed the validity of votes cast by soldiers absent from the State for Federal officers. Not so. Judge Christiancy inquired whether the act was in conflict with the State constitution in regard to the place of voting for State as well as national officers; but he did not consider whether there was any repugnancy between the latter and the Constitution of the United States. The reference to the election of officers "of the national Government" was merely incidental in the statement of the question, and was made simply for the purpose of comparing the provisions of the act with the State constitution. The court decided that the votes cast out of the State for the office of prosecuting attorney for the county of Washtenaw were void. But they expressed no opinion in reference to the legality of ballots for Representatives in Congress. Indeed, section four of article one of the Constitution of the United States was not even mentioned or referred to by either court or counsel during the entire investigation of the case. Yet while no allusion is made to that instrument the reasoning of the court is clearly against the contestant in regard to the power of the Legislature. Judge Campbell says:

"It is conceded that the power of regulating the time and manner of elections and the places where they may be held is one which is legislative in its nature, and belongs to that body which is intrusted with the general legislative authority, unless the constitution has limited or destroyed this control over it."

And Judge Cooley says:

"I have no hesitation in holding that when the time, place, and manner of holding elections are not prescribed by the constitution they are within the discretion of the Legislature, and the reception of votes from persons actually out of the election district, or even of the State, may be allowed by statute. Applying this principle to the constitutions of Ohio and Wisconsin, we cannot well doubt the validity of their statutes; and I regard the decisions made to that effect as entirely correct and satisfactory."

And Judge Christiancy remarks that—

"Without any limitation of the legislative power in our constitution, that power would have been at least as absolute and unlimited within the borders of the State as that of the Parliament in England, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

Now, in reference to the act of the Legislature, in so far as it is legitimately before us, there was no "limitation of the legislative power in our constitution," and could be none for the reasons already stated. But it is worthy of notice that the question of legislative power was properly before the court, and distinctly considered; and when we find that the act of the Legislature is relieved by the Constitution of the United States from the limitation and control of the State constitution, this decision of the supreme court of Michigan is a clear and explicit authority to establish the constitutionality of the act in question, in so far as it relates to the election of Representatives in Congress. For the learning and ability of the gentlemen constituting the majority of that court, who justly take high rank among the ablest jurists of the country, I entertain the most profound respect. Their judicial opinions upon a statute of their own State, when pertinent, ought to have great weight with the members of this House. Nevertheless I insist that the decision referred to makes nothing for the contestant. Upon the main question, the authority of the Legislature, under the Constitution of the United States, it is entirely silent.

Mr. Speaker, I have expressed my views as briefly as possible in reference to the legal rights of the parties respectively to occupy the seat now in dispute. Beyond this I shall not go. It is known to us all that during the dark and gloomy days of the war through which happily we have just passed successfully, while a large portion of the northern people openly pronounced the efforts of the Government to restore the Union "a failure," the soldiers of the Republic never repined, never faltered. They did not, however, in taking up arms throw off their citizenship; nor did they escape anxiety in regard to the conduct of civil affairs. We know that the sagacious, intrepid men of the Army often expressed more fear and apprehension of the disloyal ballot at home than of the treacherous bullet on the field of battle. While they watched the movements of the rebels in front, they kept a vigilant eye upon the enemy in the rear. They knew that peace must come from victory. They knew that hundreds of thousands of northern men were ready to make ignominious terms with traitors. They knew that without the retention of a loyal Congress all their toils, dangers, wounds, and sacrifices would be suffered in vain. We cannot marvel that they were anxious to keep the power to raise men and money for the prosecution of the war in loyal hands. We may see how difficult would be the task to convince them that a love of country strong enough to induce the hazard of their lives in her defense should render them unfit and unsafe to speak through their Representatives in the councils of the nation. And perhaps we may find it difficult to satisfy our own minds that men should be disfranchised because they stand bleeding in the defense of their country. These considerations, and many others of which they are suggestive, might appeal powerfully to our passions, our sympathies, and our gratitude; but I put them all aside. I look to the law in the case, which alone must be our guide. It would be disingenuous, however, to deny that it is satisfactory to know that in this case justice and law are commingled; that in recognizing the manhood and citizenship of the soldier, and his right to participate in the Government of that country in whose defense he is periling his life, we follow the dictates, as well of conscience as of gratitude, and uphold and maintain the supreme law of the land.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the resolutions appended to the minority report are properly before the House at this time. If not, I propose to offer these resolutions as a substitute for that submitted by the majority of the committee:

Resolved. That Hon. Rowland E. Trowbridge is not entitled to hold the seat now occupied by him in this House as a Representative from the State of Michigan.

Resolved. That Augustus C. Baldwin has been duly elected as a Representative from the State of Michigan to the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and is entitled to a seat in this House.

I wish at this time, also, to state that I have been requested by Mr. RADFORD, a member of the Committee of Elections, to say that he concurs with the minority report, and that he had directed that his name should be appended to the same. His name is omitted, as the report now appears, and I make this statement in order to place him right on the record in regard to this matter.

I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to enter at any great length into the discussion of the questions involved in this contest. Most of the points which I desire to make have already been presented as fully as I desire to present them in the report of the minority which has been read at the Clerk's desk. I have listened with some attention to the elaborate and well-considered argument of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BEAMAN,] and while it has satisfied me that a very ingenious argument may be made upon any side of almost any question, it has failed to convince me that there is any correctness in the position assumed by the majority of the committee. I am still satisfied that legally, under the constitution and laws of Michigan, and under the Constitution of the United States, Mr. Baldwin, the contestant, is entitled to the seat on this floor which he now claims.

Mr. Speaker, we sometimes rush to conclusions without sufficient premises or authority for so doing, and it does seem to me that if honorable members of this House will for themselves look into the question involved in this case, if they will lay aside everything like partisan considerations and determine the question simply upon its merits, they cannot fail to arrive at a correct conclusion upon it. Sir, we are declared by the Constitution of the United States to be the proper judges of the election, returns, and qualifications of the members of this House. We are acting in the capacity of judges. But that does not authorize us to allow any considerations except the mere legal question involved to enter into the determination of the case. As judges we should decide all legal questions with as much solemnity as if we were sitting as judges on the bench of any court of the country under our solemn oaths and responsibilities as such.

The gentleman from Michigan has taken up a great deal of time in the argument that he has submitted to the House in attempting to prove that the absence of citizens of Michigan in the armies of the United States, and beyond the limits of the State of Michigan, does not disqualify them as electors in the State of Michigan. For myself I take no such position. God forbid that I should here or elsewhere hold or insist that the citizens of any State, because of the exercise of the highest duties of patriots and patriotism, in going into the armies of the country for the purpose of vindicating the honor and integrity of the country, should thereby be disfranchised. I take no such position. I do not say that the absence of a citizen from his State, called away in the discharge of any duty whatever, disqualifies him as an elector in the State; but I take this position, that under the constitution and laws of Michigan, one of the conditions necessary to the exercise of the elective franchise was wanting; not that the citizen himself was disqualified, but he could not be present at the election, and his presence was required by the constitution of the State of Michigan.

We here are all absent from our States and from our homes; we are all qualified electors of the States in which we live. If an election should happen to transpire to-day in any one of these States, the man who is here, absent from his home, cannot exercise the right or franchise of an elector. Why can he not? Not because he is disfranchised or disqualified as an elector by his absence, but because the law of the State requires that he shall be present in person for the purpose of depositing his ballot.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me, I will ask him if the law of the State did not prescribe the place of voting for the soldier in the military service of the United States at the military headquarters; and if he was not required to be personally present at the place prescribed by law?

Mr. MARSHALL. I will come to that in a moment. I am arguing upon the supposition, which I take to be borne out by the authorities submitted to the House, that the constitution of the State of Michigan does require that the elector shall vote in the township in which he resides.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. The act of the Legislature provides that he may vote in another place. The only question is whether the Legislature or the constitutional convention had a right to prescribe the place of voting for Representatives in Congress.

Mr. MARSHALL. That is unquestionably true, but the gentleman is coming to a point in the case that I have not yet arrived at. I am answering the argument of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BEAMAN,] in regard to the question of qualification. He was combatting the idea that the place of voting is any part of the qualification of the elector. That is conceded, and therefore that portion of his argument was wholly unnecessary. I do not contend that the place of voting is a part of the qualification of the elector although there are some decisions that use that language, but I think that it is a misuse of terms. It is a condition necessary to the exercise of the right at that time, and the elector not being able to be present at the time, one of the conditions necessary to the exercise of the elective franchise was wanting, and therefore he could not properly vote.

I was answering that proposition of the gentleman from Michigan, and had not yet come to the point which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] presents.

Now, it is conceded, I believe—it certainly is in the report of the majority of the committee, and I understood it to be conceded by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAMAN] who has just taken his seat—that the constitution of the State of Michigan does require that the elector shall be present in his township and personally present his vote there on the day of the election. That is not denied; but it is said that the Legislature of the State of Michigan have passed a law authorizing polls to be opened outside of the State of Michigan, and at certain points beyond the limits of that State. Now, sir, the proper construction to be placed on the constitution of the State of Michigan has been settled by the supreme court of that State, and the judges of that court have done themselves immortal honor in deciding correctly the law of their State, although their decision was manifestly contrary to the natural feeling which they entertained in regard to what are considered the rights of the soldiers of the armies of the Republic. God forbid that any right should be denied to citizens who are exercising the highest privilege of patriots unless the organic law of the country requires that certain forms shall be observed.

The gallant soldiers who went out to fight for the Constitution and laws of the country will not demand that the Constitution and laws shall be trampled on for the purpose of securing them a right which is not taken from them, but only for a time suspended by the constitution of Michigan, and which they can exercise with the same privilege as all other citizens when they return to the townships in which they live, just as you and I can do when we return to the townships in which we live. We cannot exercise the elective franchise while we are here in the discharge of our official duties, and by the constitution of Michigan the electors of that State do not exercise the elective franchise when absent from the State in the discharge of their duty as citizens, not because they have not an equitable right to the exercise of this franchise, but because the fundamental law of their State prescribes that every vote cast by an elector shall be cast in the township in which he resides.

The supreme court, all four judges, were, as I am informed, of the political party to which the sitting member belongs. Their sympathies, and in fact the sympathies of all the good people of the country, went out with the soldiers as they marched on in defense of the rights and the Constitution of their country. The judges knew that the sympathies of the people were with the soldiers in declaring that their votes should be counted in every election in which they had been cast. But these judges arose above partisan considerations. They found the constitution of the State of Michigan, with its solemn guarantees, in their road, and, as honest judges, they declared that the act of the Legislature was in conflict with that constitution, and, in consequence thereof, it was null and void.

And their decision was approved by the entire people of Michigan, as I understand it. The leading judge of that court, who gave the ablest opinion, was reelected to that court by all parties of the people, because of his independence and manhood in thus construing properly the constitution of his State.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] if the supreme court of the State of Michigan had under consideration at all the point that this case presents here; whether they were not deciding that the law of Michigan was unconstitutional so far as their State officers were concerned; leaving the construction to be given to the Constitution of the United States, that provides that the State Legislatures shall prescribe the place of holding elections for Representatives in Congress, entirely untouched by their decision?

Mr. MARSHALL. As a matter of course this case was not before the supreme court of Michigan. It was another and a different case, and of course they could not have decided, and they have no right to decide; the case now before this House.

Mr. SCOFIELD. That is not the question I put. I asked the gentleman whether the supreme court of Michigan had that point of constitutional law which rules this case under consideration at all.

Mr. MARSHALL. So far as concerns the construction of the clause of the Federal Constitution which is now to be considered by this House, as a matter of course that question was not before them; that question was not raised.

There are two points in this case. The first is, was the act of the Legislature of Michigan in harmony with the constitution of the State of Michigan? If it was, then there is an end of the question. If it was not, then as a matter of course the act was void as far as it had reference to any officer elected by virtue of the constitution and laws of the State of Michigan.

But there is, as the gentleman suggests, another question to be considered in this case. It is said that the Legislature of the State of Michigan, so far as this question was concerned, had a power independent of and above the constitution of the State, and this power is based upon a clause of the Federal Constitution which has already been read, but to which I will call the attention of the House for a short time. Section four of article one of the Constitution of the United States, says:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

Now, the answer to that argument I have stated briefly in the report of the minority of the committee, and I do not intend at this time to go into it at any length. That answer is at least satisfactory to my own mind, however fallacious it may be deemed by other gentlemen. The object of the Convention which framed the Federal Constitution was not to determine what branch of the State government, or what particular body in a State, should determine the times, places, and manner of holding elections for members of Congress, or for any other officers. The question arose whether it was not necessary to reserve to the Federal Government the power of fixing the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives and Senators in Congress. It was suggested with great force that if the Federal Government did not reserve to itself this power, a majority of the States might become refractory, and by the simple act of refusing to elect Senators and members of Congress, destroy the Federal Government; because there being no Legislature, there not being a quorum of either branch of the national Legislature, the functions of the Federal Government would cease, and it would be destroyed by the mere non-action of the States, and there would be no remedy. They therefore said, "It is necessary to reserve to the Federal Government the power to fix or prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections; but we will leave this to the States in the first place if they will exercise it; but if they fail to exercise it, then the power must be reserved to Congress, so that the functions of the Federal Government shall not cease to operate." The idea, and the only idea in the mind of the framers of the Federal Constitution was this: "Let us reserve this power to the Federal Government as an ulterior power to be exercised for its preservation; but let us leave the exercise of the power in the first place to the States." And, in expressing this power to be exerted on the part of a State, they used the term "the Legislature."

Now, the question arises very properly, what is meant by that term, "the Legislature?" I know, Mr. Speaker, that there is room for argument upon this point; but what is a "Legislature?" The body which usually enacts laws in my State is not legally and constitutionally called a "Legislature" at all; it is called a "General Assembly." In Massachusetts, I believe, the body usually enacting the laws is called a "General Court;" in some of the New England States that term is certainly used to designate the ordinary legislative body. Various terms are used in the constitutions of the various States; and I know of no instance in which the body usually enacting the laws for a State is in the constitution eo nomine denominated a "Legislature."

What is the meaning of a "Legislature" in its broadest and proper sense as used in this clause of the Federal Constitution? It is, as I maintain, that body in whose hands is reposed the legislative powers of a State. What body is that? It is the people themselves in their collective capacity—those who are electors of the State.

Mr. BEAMAN. I desire to ask the gentleman whether, in the Convention that framed the Constitution, there was not a distinct proposition made to give the power to elect Senators to the people of the State instead of the Legislature, and whether that proposition was not voted down.

Mr. MARSHALL. That question, sir, does not affect at all the argument which I am making; and if the gentleman will listen to me he will see in a moment that it does not.

I contend that the people of any State may provide that an assemblage of the representatives of the people, to be called a "convention," shall assemble periodically, say every second year, that it shall be constituted of but one body, that the whole legislative power of the State shall be vested in that body, and that, under the Federal Constitution, that body may elect Senators, for it would be the only Legislature of the State, under the other clause, although it should be called a convention of the people merely, and nobody should call it a "Legislature."

The question before the Convention at the time to which the gentleman refers was simply whether Senators, members of the other branch of this Congress, should be elected by the people directly or by the Legislatures; but that does not answer the argument which I am making. I say that a convention is, in the first place, the great Legislature of a State; the convention which is called for the purpose of framing the constitution of a State—its organic law—that is the sovereign Legislature. It is the only Legislature of the State that has sovereign power. The subordinate body, popularly called a Legislature, constituted by such a convention in the organic law, is a body that exercises but the residuum, a moiety of the legislative powers of a State. The Legislature proper of the State is the convention of the State, exercising the only sovereign power in the State. It is called for the purpose of legislating in regard to the organic and fundamental principles of the government of the State, and of delegating to another body, popularly called a "Legislature," certain subordinate powers which this convention may at any time take away.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for one moment?

Mr. MARSHALL. Of course I will.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If the word "Legislature" in the Constitution of the United States is broad enough in its meaning to include a constitutional convention of the State, I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether, in his judgment, such a convention can exhaust the power which the Constitution has conferred upon the continuing legislative power of the State. Suppose that the convention meets, acts upon the question, and is dissolved forever; is the power which the Constitution of the United States confers upon the Legislature, and which, from its very nature, is a continuing power, exhausted forever, because the convention that exercised it once has adjourned?

Mr. MARSHALL. If the gentleman will hear me through, I will come to these points in their regular order. I certainly do hold that the convention of a State, in adopting the organic law of the State, may limit the power of the body popularly called a "Legislature" in regard to the elective franchise, and in regard to the times, places, and manner of holding elections; that this is a power which is delegated to a State, and to the Legislature of a State, if you see proper to use the term. But I insist the convention, assembled for the purpose of adopting the organic law of a State, is the Legislature proper, and that the General Assembly, the General Court, or Legislative Council, whatever it may be called, is a creature of the State constitution. The Legislature of a State is restricted in action by the limits placed upon it by the organic law of a State, and cannot transcend those limits unless there is some absolute and necessary conflict between the organic law of a State and the Constitution of the United States, and there is none in this case.

I believe I have already made the point that the term "Legislature" means the law-making power of a State, which power resides, in the first place, in the people, the aggregate body of electors; but in our country it is exercised usually by delegates of the people sent to a State convention, and afterward, in subordination to the constitution thereby framed, sent to the legislative body created by them, and authorized to exercise that residuum of power delegated to them by the "Legislature" proper.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am strengthened in this position by the fact that the whole people of this country, from the adoption of the Federal Constitution down to the present time, have so understood the powers placed in the hands of a State Legislature; and I believe in nearly every State of this Union they have fixed and placed in their State constitutions limitations upon the powers of the Legislatures in prescribing the time, place, and manner of holding elections in the States. And by no judicial tribunal or legislative body has that power been disputed for one moment until this case arose before Congress.

I do not propose an exhaustive discussion of this question to-day. Indeed, I imagine all I may say will have no influence whatever upon the vote of a single member upon this floor; but as I differ decidedly and emphatically from the conclusions of the majority of the Committee of Elections, I feel it to be due to myself that I shall present briefly the points on which I differ from them, and the reasons for that difference.

This is no new question. The people of the States in the conventions which framed their organic laws, in nearly every one of them, placed limits upon the legislative bodies, the creatures of the constitutions, in regard to this question. This matter has been before this House; and it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, if we have regard to precedent and consistency in our own action, that for the sake of the future and for the sake of the effect this decision may have on the future, we ought to abide by the decisions of the past. This question in regard to the exercise of the elective franchise by citizens who are beyond the limits of their States, in the discharge of sacred duty as citizens, is one growing out of the late unhappy conflict.

It is to be hoped such a question will never again arise in our country. It is temporary in its character, but the questions of constitutional construction are of vast and paramount importance, not only to the people at this time, but for all future time. It is important that we should not make precedents which will hereafter come up in judgment against us in regard to these great constitutional questions. It is, therefore, of vast importance that these questions should be considered carefully and decided properly.

I insist that this very House has time and again decided the very question now before us, and has uniformly decided it in favor of the position I have taken. There is not a decision to be found anywhere in antagonism to this position.

The case of Shiel vs. Thayer, in the Thirty-Seventh Congress, reported in Bartlett's Contested-Election Cases, page 349, is directly in point. The syllabus of the case says:

"The constitution of Oregon has fixed beyond the control of its Legislature the time for holding an election for Representative in Congress.

"The report in that case was made by the then and now able chairman of the Committee of Elections, Mr. DAWES, and the right of Mr. Shiel to the seat was placed distinctly on the ground that the people of Oregon had the right in their constitution to fix the time for the election of a member of Congress.

"The committee, says the report, are of the opinion that the election held for Representative in Congress on the first Monday in June, 1860, was held in pursuance of, and in conformity with, the constitution and laws of Oregon, and that consequently the contestant is entitled to the seat. And again: notwithstanding this constitutional provision that general elections shall be held on the first Monday of June biennially, the Legislature of Oregon seems to have believed that it had power to fix another time for the election of Representative in Congress."

"The committee have not deemed it necessary to determine what those reasons are for. With all due respect to the opinions of the gentlemen composing the Legislature, they are of opinion that this House must nevertheless be the final judge of the meaning of this clause of the constitution of Oregon. And, for the reason stated, the committee have no doubt that the constitution of the State has fixed beyond the control of the Legislature the time for holding an election for Representative in Congress, at the general election to be held biennially, and that at such election, so held in pursuance of the constitution, the contestant was duly elected. And again, in the debate in the House on this case, Mr. DAWES said, 'It occurs to me, sir, that that provision of the Constitution of the United States which says that the time and place shall be specified by the Legislature of each State, meant simply that they should be fixed by the constituted authority of the State until Congress itself should fix a time for the election in all the States.'

Mr. UPSON. I would ask the gentlemen whether the Legislature of the State of Oregon had passed any act in reference to the election of a Representative in Congress?

Mr. MARSHALL. The constitution of the State had fixed the time for holding the election, and the decision was placed distinctly upon the ground that the constitution of the State did govern as to the time, place, and manner of holding the election.

Mr. JOHNSON. Allow me to answer the gentleman's question. The constitution of the State of Oregon provided that the laws enacted by the Territorial Legislature should be in force until repealed by the State Legislature. The Territorial Legislature provided for the election of a Delegate to Congress. It was on that authority the decision was made.

Mr. UPSON. Does the Constitution of the United States recognize a Territorial Legislature in this connection?

Mr. JOHNSON. I was speaking of the constitution of the State of Oregon.

Mr. MARSHALL. I prefer going on myself. Now, sir, here is the language of the committee in that case, and the members of this House must determine for themselves whether this was not the point which at that time was before the committee and the House for decision:

"The committee are of opinion that the election held for Representative in Congress on the first Monday in June, 1860, was held in pursuance and in conformity with the constitution and laws of Oregon, and that consequently the contestant is entitled to the seat."

"The committee would have had no difficulty in coming to this conclusion had it not been for the action of the Legislature of Oregon upon this subject. Notwithstanding this constitutional provision that general elections shall be held on the first Monday of June biennially, the Legislature of Oregon seems to have believed that it had power to fix another time for the election of Representatives in Congress."

"Various reasons have been given for this action of the Legislature, about which the contestant and sitting member widely differ. The committee have not deemed it necessary to determine what those reasons are, for, with all due respect to the opinions of the gentlemen composing that Legislature, they are of opinion that this House must nevertheless be the final judge of the meaning of this clause of the constitution of Oregon, so far as it touches the question under consideration. And for the reasons stated the committee have no doubt that the constitution of the State has fixed, beyond the control of the Legislature, the time for holding an election of Representative in Congress at the general election to be held biennially, and that at such election, so held, in pursuance of the constitution, the contestant was duly elected to the Thirty-Seventh Congress."

Thus it appears that the committee in that case placed the right of the party directly on the very question that is now before the House for its decision. That report was made by the present chairman of the Committee of Elections, [Mr. DAWES,] and the decision was placed distinctly on the ground that the people of Oregon had the right to fix limits, by their constitution, upon the action of their Legislature in regard to the time of holding elections. They fixed it beyond the control of the Legislature.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] if he intends to have a vote upon this question this afternoon.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. If it can be reached tonight I wished to have the vote. I will not determine anything about it, only I do not believe it will be reached.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] yield?

Mr. MARSHALL. I would like to hear the chairman of the committee, but I would a little rather get through.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to say, as I agree with the committee in the conclusion to which they have arrived, and as I still adhere to the position assumed in that report which the gentleman has quoted from, that I would consider it a privilege if the gentleman would let me have a minute or two for the purpose of stating the grounds upon which I arrived at that conclusion, and the reason why I am still of the opinion expressed in that report.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I got remaining?

The SPEAKER. Nineteen minutes.

Mr. MARSHALL. I will yield if it is not taken out of my time.

No objection being made, Mr. DAWES was allowed to proceed as follows:

Mr. DAWES. I agree with the majority of the committee in the resolution reported by them, that the sitting member is entitled to his seat, and I think that resolution ought to pass. I do not, however, concur fully in the views set forth in the report of the committee by which they arrive at that conclusion; and as the position which was assumed by the Committee of Elections in 1861 upon this point has been summoned in aid of the minority report in this case, I desire briefly to state my view of the subject.

The report of the majority of the committee as well as that of the minority, proceeds upon what they concede to be the fact, that the statute of the State of Michigan is in conflict with the constitution of that State. It goes upon that concession very much to my surprise, for I think that nobody can read the constitution of the State of Michigan and be entirely clear that the statute of the State of Michigan is at all in conflict with that constitution. If, therefore, the statute of the State of Michigan allowing its soldiers to vote outside of the State is not in conflict with the constitution of the State, the whole argument, as well as the whole ground taken by the minority, falls.

Let me ask the House to listen to this clause of the constitution of the State of Michigan, which it is conceded in this whole argument this soldiers' voting law is in conflict with:

"No citizen or inhabitant shall be an elector, or entitled to vote at any election, unless he shall be above the age of twenty-one years, and has resided in the State three months, and in the township or ward in which he offers to vote ten days next preceding such election."

The provision in relation to "the township or ward in which he offers to vote" is claimed by those who pronounce this statute unconstitutional to require that the voter must be personally present in that township or that ward to deposit his vote. I do not think it by any means follows that he must be personally present. The mode and manner of his depositing his vote in that township or ward is not prescribed in the constitution of the State of Michigan. It may be by proxy. It is just as competent for him to vote by proxy as it is for him to vote in person, inasmuch as there is no express provision that he shall vote in person. The State of New York has adopted that very method of voting, by proxy. The sole purpose, it seems to me, of the provision in the constitution of Michigan is to prescribe that in that township or ward his vote shall be deposited and be effectual and count, but on the mode and manner in which it shall be so deposited the constitution of the State of Michigan is silent, leaving it for the Legislature to prescribe. I do not believe the constitution of Michigan contemplated that it should not be in the power of the Legislature of the State to provide that all voters in a city might deposit their ballots in a single ballot-box. If this argument against the constitutionality of the soldiers' voting law is sustained, it prevents the Legislature of Michigan from providing that the electors of a given city shall deposit their votes in a single ballot-box at one place in the city, but they must be deposited in as many voting precincts as there are wards. I do not think the constitution of Michigan is open to that construction. At any rate it is not by any means free of doubt on that point, and I cannot pronounce a law of the State of Michigan unconstitutional unless there is some clearer reason for it than that suggested by this argument; and therefore it is that upon that ground alone I am able to sustain this position of the committee and still adhere to the position taken by the committee in 1861.

There is another point, however, upon which the decision of the committee in 1861 would stand unaffected by this case even were the law of the State of Michigan in conflict with the constitution of that State. It has been alluded to by my colleague on the committee, and also by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BEAMAN.]

There was no law in the State of Oregon in conflict with its constitution. The State of Oregon had omitted entirely through its Legislature eo nomine to prescribe any other time for the election of a member of Congress than that which had been prescribed in the constitutional convention at the origin of the State, which was itself a legislative body in very many respects, so that there is no conflict between the position here assumed by the committee and the position assumed by the committee in that case, though there may be a conflict in the language used in the report, for I admit that the language of the report of the committee goes to the full extent claimed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] at this time. I adhere to that language, for I am not of opinion that the Legislature of a State can, in conflict with its own constitution, prescribe a different time or a different manner of holding the election. A State or Territory derives its Legislature from its constitution, and when the constitution devolved upon the Legislature eo nomine this authority, it must have assumed that that Legislature must always act, when it did act, in conformity with the very law of its being and under such limitations as its creator had imposed upon it. I believe, as I did then, that whenever the Legislature of a State is required by the constitution of the State to perform any act, it presupposes that that Legislature would act in conformity with the very law prescribed for its existence by the constitution itself, which was its creator.

If the doctrine is assumed that the Legislature of a State can, in spite of its constitution, prescribe the mode and manner of election, then it is competent for the Legislature of Michigan to declare by a resolution that they will assemble in the city of Baltimore and choose their Senators in Congress, notwithstanding the constitution of the State says it shall assemble at the State capital. I do not think that the idea that a Legislature can disregard the limitations of the State constitution is at all necessary for the support of this case. To my mind it is rather so dangerous a doctrine that I do not desire to stand committed to it unless I am compelled to do so.

Mr. UPSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] a question in relation to a restriction upon the Legislature by the constitutional convention of a State. If the convention should prohibit the Legislature from choosing a Governor of the State to the United States Senate, would the Legislature of a State be bound by that prohibition?

Mr. DAWES. If I understand the question of the gentleman, it is this: can the constitution of a State impose any additional qualifications upon a member of this body, or of the other branch of Congress, than those prescribed in the Constitution of the United States? Certainly not; for the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land. That Constitution has prescribed those qualifications, and they can neither be added to nor taken from by the Legislature of a State. But if the Constitution of the United States had said that such and such qualifications shall exist, and then had further said, and such other qualifications as the Legislatures of the State shall severally prescribe, then if the Legislatures should act at all they would be obliged to act under the law prescribed by their own State constitutions.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] a question. I do not quarrel with him at all because he comes to the same conclusion to which I have come by a different mode of reasoning. I would a great deal rather have any position which I take supported by two propositions than by only one. Therefore I have no conflict of logic with the gentleman from Massachusetts for coming to the same conclusion with myself, and I am not going to dispose of any of the arguments advanced by him.

But I wish to ask him this question: taking the Oregon case, for instance, is there in his judgment anything in the conclusions to which the committee came in that case that is at all in conflict with the logic used by the majority of the Committee of Elections in this case?

Mr. DAWES. I have already stated, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL,] that I did not think the Oregon case of itself, beyond some remarks made in the report, was at all in conflict with the positions assumed by the committee in this case. I do admit that there were some remarks in the report itself which are in conflict with the report of the committee now under consideration.

I have to say further only that I heartily support the resolutions which have been reported by the majority of the committee in this case, in which I join, and I desire merely to put upon record this explanation of the Oregon case, which has been cited as authority against that report.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I asked the question only that the gentleman might state it more distinctly than I thought he had stated it, that the House might not come to the conclusion that the majority of the committee were overriding all precedents.

Mr. DAWES. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] is right, that the Oregon case is not a precedent against him. All there is in the Oregon case that can be used against the gentleman from Pennsylvania, is the unfortunate reasoning of the chairman of the committee in that case. The chairman of the committee undertook to use arguments, unnecessarily as it turned out, to support a position which stood well enough with out that reasoning.

Mr. MARSHALL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] a question. If there is a conflict between the constitution of a State and the act of its Legislature in regard to the place of holding elections, must not the act of the Legislature fall and the constitution of the State stand?

Mr. DAWES. I can come to no other conclusion than this: if there is a conflict between the law of the State of Michigan and the constitution of the State of Michigan, the law made by the Legislature, which was itself created by the constitution, must yield to the constitution.

Mr. MARSHALL. Then I wish to put this further question: whether, if there is a conflict between the constitution of the State of Michigan and the act of the Legislature referred to, Mr. Baldwin is not entitled to his seat?

Mr. DAWES. If I entertained any doubt that the law of the State of Michigan, the "soldiers' voting act," as it is called, was constitutional, I should be led by the reasoning which I have just offered to the House, to vote for the resolution reported by the minority. But I am not of that opinion, and therefore I shall not vote for that resolution.

Mr. MARSHALL. I wish to ask the gentleman this further question: what is the rightful authority to determine the proper construction of the constitution of a State? Is not the decision of the supreme court of a State in regard to the proper construction of the constitution of a State binding upon all the tribunals?

Mr. DAWES. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that, as to every matter within its jurisdiction, the supreme court of Michigan is the final arbiter, subject to the appellate authority of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. MARSHALL. That is all that is necessary.

Mr. DAWES. But upon the point now submitted to this House, the supreme court of Michigan, as I doubt not the gentleman from Illinois will admit, had no jurisdiction.

Mr. MARSHALL. This case of course was not before the supreme court of Michigan, but the question as to the proper construction of their constitution was; and the honorable chairman of the Committee of Elections says that if there is a conflict between the constitution of the State of Michigan and an act of the Legislature of that State, the constitution must stand and the act must fall; and that the supreme court of the State of Michigan is the authoritative body to determine the proper construction of that constitution. That tribunal, Mr. Speaker, has determined the question as to whether there is a conflict between the constitution of that State and the act of the Legislature of that State.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say one word more. My opinion is that if there are two bodies—

Mr. MARSHALL. I would prefer not to yield any further as my time is nearly exhausted.

The honorable chairman of the committee has, it seems to me, if there is anything in logic, admitted away this whole case. He tells the House that, if there is a conflict between the constitution of the State of Michigan and an act of the Legislature of that State, the constitution must stand and the act of the Legislature must fall, and that the supreme court of that State is the proper tribunal to determine the correct construction of that constitution. That tribunal has determined it, and has declared that there is a direct conflict between the State constitution and the act of the Legislature. Therefore, according to the premises of the gentleman himself, he cannot, it seems to me, do otherwise than sustain the claims of Mr. Baldwin to a seat upon this floor. All the essential points of the case the gentleman admits to be in favor of the contestant.

It is true that the majority of the committee hold that, notwithstanding that conflict which they admit, the Legislature under the Constitution of the United States had power independent of the constitution of the State. But that is not the position which the honorable chairman of the committee takes; and I insist that there is nothing left for the majority of the committee to stand upon.

Now, sir, I do not agree with the honorable chairman in regard to the case from Oregon. I insist that is a case directly in point. But that is not the only case. In the case of Farlee vs. Runk, a case from New Jersey, in the first session of the Twenty-Ninth Congress, a question arose as to the validity of the votes of certain students at Princeton college, New Jersey. The question was whether the place of voting fixed by the constitution of the State or that prescribed by an act of the Legislature was the proper place. The committee decided that the constitution must govern, and that it overrode the provision of the act of the Legislature on that subject.

Mr. SCOFIELD. That was a question of residence.

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes, sir, as to where the voter should cast his vote.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The question was not whether the Legislature or the constitutional convention of the State had the right to fix the place of holding the election, but whether those students voted in the place at which the law prescribed they should vote.

Mr. MARSHALL. The act of the Legislature prescribed one place, the constitution of the State prescribed another. The constitution, as the committee construed it, permitted those students to vote at Princeton; the act of the Legislature denied them that privilege. The committee held in that case that the constitution should govern, and that those students were legally qualified voters at that place; that they had the right to cast their ballots at Princeton, though that was prohibited by the act of the Legislature. The question as to the place of casting the ballot of the elector was the very question before the committee at that time; and they decided that the constitution of New Jersey and not the act of the Legislature should govern in regard to the place of voting.

But, Mr. Speaker, I will not consume further time in the discussion of this point. I will proceed to notice one or two other points in the case.

Admitting all that is contended for by the Committee of Elections and by the gentleman from Michigan who opened the argument in this case, I maintain that votes cast outside of and beyond the State of Michigan by the citizens thereof, cannot properly be computed in determining the right to the seat now contested in this House.

I insist that under this clause of the Constitution neither the Legislature of a State nor the Congress of the United States can prescribe a place of voting beyond the limits of the State where the officer is elected. We must look at the objects and purposes of this clause in the Constitution. Did the framers of the Constitution ever dream that they were granting to the Federal Congress power to prescribe places of voting for members of Congress beyond the district and State in which they were to be elected? Is it not clear that if Congress may prescribe a place of voting outside of the State for a portion of the electors, it may also prescribe a place or places for all of the electors outside of the State in which they reside?

We are told, I believe by Cicero, of a law enacted in one of the ancient States which provided that any one who drew blood in the streets should suffer death, and yet the judges very properly held that this did not apply to a surgeon, who bled a patient in the streets for the purpose of saving his life. They arrived at this conclusion by abandoning the literal sense of the words of the statute, and looking at the objects and purposes for which it was enacted.

Why, Mr. Speaker, in the construction of all powers granted, we must have reference to the object for which the power is given. At and before the adoption of the Constitution, and ever since, until within the last five years, all voters, everywhere in the United States, were required to vote within the district and State for which the officer is elected. At the time of the adoption of this clause, it is not easy to suppose that any one member of the Convention for one moment thought that they were granting to Congress the power to permit citizens to vote outside of the district and State for which the officers were to be elected. If the Legislature possesses this power, undoubtedly Congress possesses the same power. And if Congress possesses the power to prescribe places of voting outside of a district or State for a portion of its citizens, why not the power to prescribe places of voting outside of the State for all the citizens thereof? Why not prescribe that all the citizens of Michigan shall vote in Chicago for their members of Congress, and all the voters of Illinois go to St. Louis to vote for theirs? It may be said that this would be a gross abuse of power. But I deny the existence of any such power. And yet, if the power contended for by the committee exists, the other follows as a necessary consequence.

But the act of the Michigan Legislature (by virtue of which the votes were cast outside of the State that it is proposed to count for the sitting member) does not prescribe the place or places of voting, and consequently the votes were not cast in pursuance of any competent authority. The provision of said statute is as follows:

"Sec. 7. At the elections herein provided for a poll shall be opened at every place, whether within or without the State, where a regiment, battalion, battery, or company of Michigan soldiers may be found or stationed; and at such election all persons may vote who are thereto entitled by law and by the provisions of this act."

Now, will any one pretend that that prescribes a place or places of election? What place or places? Would a law which provided that any elector of Michigan should vote at any place, within or without the State, where he might happen to be on the day of election, prescribe a place of voting? This is too clear, I submit with all deference, to admit of argument. If Congress or the Legislature can prescribe places of election outside of the State, I insist that the places must be named in the act; and that it is no compliance with the constitution to provide that a man, or a company of men, may vote at any place where they may happen to be on the day of election, and that such a law does not prescribe a place of election at all.

Mr. BEAMAN. I wish to say these places they have fixed in Michigan comprise whole counties. They have not fixed precise places at which the election shall be held.

Mr. MARSHALL. I suppose they have not fixed the house, but they have fixed the place.

Mr. BEAMAN. The place is fixed by the township clerk by law.

Mr. MARSHALL. I have read the act. I ask gentlemen to say whether that is fixing the place for voting? Is that prescribing the place? Is that writing down the place of voting according to the language of the constitution? The act does not prescribe the place or places for voting, and does not conform to this provision of the constitution. Would it be in conformity to this provision to have a commission go out to all places in Europe or America and take the votes of citizens of Michigan in the place or places in which they may happen to be found on the day of election?

It seems to me to be a most monstrous position for gentlemen to take for the purpose of maintaining the title of the claimant in this case to a seat. No place is fixed. It is as if you should go out with your ballot-box, wander over the country, and take the vote of every citizen of the State, wherever he happened to be on the day of election. I say that that is not prescribing or fixing a place at all. It is not naming it. It is in no sense acting in conformity with the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I have now said all I propose to say in regard to this matter. As a matter of course, I expect every gentleman to act in conformity with his own judgment. If there were no constitutional objection in the way, I should care but little as to which of the gentlemen claiming the seat should be preferred. I have no feeling whatever in this case, but I do think it is a matter of importance that we, sitting as judges here, should decide this question rightly, and in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the country.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I understand that Mr. Baldwin, the contestant, says it is impossible for him to be here to-morrow. I would like to ask him how long he desires to speak.

Mr. BALDWIN, (the contestant.) Having been confined to my bed for three days past, I feel quite unable to proceed now. This is a matter in which I of course feel some interest, and I would like to have permission to print the argument I have prepared. The House may then dispose of the case this afternoon or to-morrow morning, as they please.

Mr. MARSHALL. I move that the contestant have leave to print his remarks.

No objection being made, leave to print was accordingly granted.

The following is the argument prepared by Mr. BALDWIN, (contestant.) Mr. Speaker, in appearing before this House as a claimant for a seat therein, the novelty as well as the importance of the matter places me in an embarrassing position. I would gladly defer to some other the task thus necessarily imposed, but justice to myself and those who gave me their votes at the congressional election in my district demand of me the performance of this duty. I do not come a mere suppliant for favors to be granted, but with a sincere belief that my title to a position in this body is equal to that of any of its members. The law has imposed certain forms in cases of contests. To those I must conform, and however much the final determination may not accord with my individual views it will be binding upon all. From it there is no appeal; and to make it equitable, just, and satisfactory to the parties and to yourselves it will require a careful examination of the questions involved in this contest. I shall endeavor to present the facts as plainly and with as much brevity as the case will admit.

The fifth congressional district of Michigan is composed of six counties; and in them, at the November election, 1864, of the votes polled I received a majority of 125. These were all in accordance with the established provisions of law, and of their validity no question has been raised. If no change had been made by the Legislature in the manner of conducting the elections in Michigan, my right would be undisputed. But, during the legislative session of 1864, a soldiers' voting law was enacted, allowing polls to be opened where ever a Michigan regiment, a company, or a detached portion of one was "found or stationed;" and all soldiers from Michigan, with certain restrictions, were allowed to cast their votes. The law, however, did not restrict this voting to the members of Michigan regiments, but permitted those from Michigan in the service of the United States, or soldiers "present from other States," to vote on those occasions. The electors were authorized to open polls and choose three inspectors of election; and, as those voting places were not fixed at any particular locality, it followed that any three soldiers from Michigan, "detached," could go through the ceremony of holding an election.

A sufficient number of votes are admitted to have been cast at these voting places, outside of the limits of the State of Michigan, at the election in November, 1864, to overcome my majority on the home vote, and give it to my competitor. These votes, I insist, were void by the Constitution of the United States and the laws and constitution of Michigan. It is assumed on the part of my opponent that the place of voting is not a qualification, and forms no part of it; that the constitution of Michigan cannot affect, control, or regulate the place of voting by the electors for Representatives in Congress, but that this matter is wholly delegated by the Constitution of the United States to the Legislatures of the respective States; and as the main question involved in the case under consideration rests upon the proper construction of the provisions of the national Constitution, and what is a "qualification" for a voter, I trust I may be permitted to go somewhat into detail relative to this subject.

Section two of article one of the Federal Constitution provides that—

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

Section four provides that—

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations," &c.

It is by virtue of this section that it is assumed that a State Legislature have absolute, unlimited control in fixing the times and places of holding an election for members of Congress. I think it will not be denied but that the people of the various States have an undoubted right through their various constitutions to prescribe any qualification for electors for members of the State Legislature they may deem expedient, no matter how fanciful or severe may be that qualification, attached as a prerequisite to voting. By the Federal Constitution the same must apply to the electors of Representatives in Congress. The Constitution of the United States has so provided, and the Federal and State organic laws must go hand in hand, peacefully and harmoniously, in allowing the exercise by the electors of the privileges conferred. If the constitution of a State wholly discard color, sex, or residence, and it should permit every person twenty-one years of age to vote for State representatives, it will have thus fixed the qualifications for congressional electors, and the people of other States restricting suffrage to white male adult citizens, and that after a long residence, have no right to object. So, if a State constitution make place a qualification, it extends to and controls electors for members to this House. Here is where the issue is between my opponent and myself. He contends that "place" has nothing to do with the right to the exercise of suffrage, and that any law passed by a State Legislature authorizing voting at any place out of the State would be valid; and a person elected by such votes would be entitled to his seat, no matter if they were void for all other officers. As monstrous as is this doctrine, as destructive as it would be in overturning and annihilating every barrier to preserve the purity of the elective franchise, it has its advocates and supporters, and, it may be, will be sanctioned and adopted by this House.

The people of Michigan, in their first constitution of 1835, gave extensive voting privileges to the electors of that State. They provided that—

"In all elections every white male citizen, above the age of twenty-one years, having resided in the State six months next preceding any election, shall be entitled to vote at such election; but no such citizen or inhabitant shall be entitled to vote except in the district, county, or township in which he shall actually reside at the time of such election."

At that time our State composed only one congressional district, and an elector could vote anywhere in the State. A few years' experience taught the people that the privilege thus loosely conferred was open to fraud, and to avoid that difficulty, and to bring the voter face to face with his neighbors at the polls, the constitution was amended in 1839, restricting the casting the vote to the "township or ward." In 1850 we formed a new constitution, and with the experience of the two former, the people again provided in section one, article seven—

"But no citizen or inhabitant shall be an elector or entitled to vote unless he shall be above the age of twenty-one years, and has resided in this State three months, and in the township or ward in which he offers to vote, ten days next preceding such election."

It will be observed that this provision of the constitution fixes the qualification of electors for all the various elective officers, both State and national. No discrimination is made as to the electors, and the qualifications are as definite as language can make them—citizenship, &c., above the age of twenty-one years, residence in the State three months, and in the township or ward in which he offers to vote, ten days next preceding an election. This is all to be taken together; and if the age and residence are "qualifications," no sound reasoning can separate the place of voting from the category.

Without referring at present to the other aids in fixing a meaning to these words, they would prove that all votes cast outside of the town or ward of a voter's residence would be invalid. But at the election of November, 1864, by virtue of the act to which I have referred, votes were cast beyond the bounds of the State for all the various officers to be chosen at that election. A case involving the constitutionality of the law authorizing those votes for a prosecuting attorney, and which votes were cast at the same time, in the same manner, and by virtue of the same law as those claimed by my opponent, was submitted to the supreme court of the State, and, after a patient, thorough examination, an opinion was given by each of the judges upon the matter. All of them proclaimed their desire to give the right of suffrage to the soldiers, but they alleged they had a stern duty to perform under the constitution, and that duty must override all mere personal considerations. The members of that supreme court were all Republicans. Three of them gave opinions adverse to the law, and one in favor of it—holding it to be unconstitutional and invalid.

It is contended that this case was one only involving votes for a local officer, and ought not to be allowed as an authority in the case now under consideration; that it was mere State authority, and to give it any validity would be sustaining the dogma of "State rights." I should be sorry if any gentleman possessed nerves sufficiently weak to be frightened by this; yet I know that in the past every species of fallacious reasoning, as well as perversion of the ordinary significance of language, has been resorted to to sustain the various positions assumed to thwart the evident object of the constitution. Whether this decision involved any question of State rights, according as that subject has been bruited upon this floor for years past, I must confess I am unable to determine. But it is certain it does concern those great fundamental rights of the people, upon which depend the preservation and the perpetuity of our grand system of free representative government—the inculcating a respect for the laws and an obedience to the interpretation given them by the constituted authorities of the States. Each State judiciary has a right to interpret a State constitution, and the interpretation given it is not only binding in the State, but is recognized and respected by all other bodies. Such has ever been the practice in this country. Such is the established rule in the Supreme Court of the United States. Story, in his work on the Constitution, section 385, upon this point says:

"We find the power to construe the Constitution expressly confided to the judicial department, without any limitation or qualification as to its conclusiveness."

In 1844 the supreme court of Michigan pronounced the general banking law of that State unconstitutional. Afterward, some parties, dissatisfied with the holding of the State court upon the question, brought suit in the Federal court, and the case was appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. In giving the opinion in the latter court the Chief Justice said:

"It is the established doctrine of this court that it will adopt and follow the decisions of the State courts in the construction of their own constitutions and statutes, when that construction has been settled by the decision of its highest judicial tribunal."—Howard, 812.

The "highest judicial tribunal" of Michigan pronounced this law unconstitutional, holding that Michigan voters could only vote in the townships or wards in which they resided, and that votes cast in any other place were invalid. The position of those judges, their familiarity with the Michigan constitution and the Michigan statutes, gave them opportunity to be better informed concerning the provisions and requirements of that constitution and the validity of this law than can be had by those who probably never read either, and their opinion should be respected, obeyed, and followed, even by the Congress of the United States.

To show that they took into consideration the votes cast for Federal as well as State officers, let me call your attention to a few extracts from their opinions. On page 9 of the printed papers in this case Justice Christiancy says:

"Does the constitution prohibit the Legislature from authorizing, as they purport to have done by this act, the qualified electors of this State who may be in the military service of this State, or of the United States, to vote for officers of the State and national Government at any other place than the township in which they respectively reside, and while they are absent from such township?"

Again, on page 10, speaking of the provisions of the constitution of 1835, he says:

"Under this provision an elector might vote for any State officer, and for President and Vice President, at any place in the State."

And in response to the question previously propounded by himself, after a course of reasoning unanswerable, he says:

"Now, I cannot bring myself to doubt that, in view of the amendment of 1839, avowedly for the purpose of confining the elector's right to vote within the township of his residence, this provision of the present constitution, so similar in its language and apparent purpose, was understood by the people as intended to have the same effect, so far as regards the place and act of voting. I am entirely satisfied that the people must have understood both to deny every elector the right of voting at any other place than the township or ward of his residence, or while absent from such residence."

"I am, therefore, reluctantly brought to the conclusion that the act is in direct conflict with the constitution, and for this reason void."

The act is not valid for any purpose, neither State nor national, but void, absolutely void.

Justice Cooley in giving his views is equally explicit, and I wish particularly to call your attention to his opinion to show that he had congressional votes in his mind at the time of announcing it, and that he at least did not believe that an election for members of Congress was separate and distinct from one for State officers. His opinion evinces that he took a broad view of the subject-matter, and came to the honest conclusion that the law was void for all purposes. On page 15, he says:

"We find, then, on looking into this history, that the constitution of 1835, after fixing the qualifications of electors, added the negative clause, that 'no such citizen or inhabitant shall be entitled to vote, except in the district, county, or township in which he shall actually reside at the time of such election.' (Article two, section one.) The evil supposed to exist under the provision was, that an elector might vote anywhere in the election district, and, as that district for the election of State officers was the whole State, and county officers the whole county, he might for those officers vote anywhere in the State or county, as he might also for member of Congress anywhere in the congressional district, and the usual safeguards, by challenge, &c., were rendered of little value, if he saw fit to vote where personally unknown. The people remedied that evil by an amendment, adopted in 1839, which substituted for the words 'district, county, or township,' the words 'township or ward,' thus clearly requiring the personal presence of the elector in the township or ward of his residence as a condition of the right to vote."

This is clear and explicit. He briefly refers to the changes made in the various constitutions, and substantially says that under that of 1835 a man might vote for member of Congress at any place in the congressional district, and to remedy the evils engendered by the latitude of the provisions of that instrument, the amendment of 1839 was adopted, (and which amendment is carried to the existing constitution) "requiring the personal presence of the elector in the township or ward of his residence as a condition of his right to vote." Right to vote! For what? The portion of the sentence immediately preceding shows that he distinctly refers to a member of Congress.

Justice Campbell, in giving his opinion, is equally explicit. He says:

"By examining the section we find that it makes provision for every possible election which can be held at all, under the authority of the State: 'No citizen or inhabitant shall be an elector, or entitled to vote at any election,' unless he shall come within the subsequent provisions. In the next place every election must be in some township or ward; for the voter, in order to 'vote at any election,' must 'offer to vote, in the township or ward' in which he has resided 'ten days next preceding such election.' Whether he gives in his vote on the spot, or whether it is given in fact somewhere else, to become by some legal construction a vote in the township, he must vote at the election in the township or not at all; for thus far there is no possibility of misconception. Again, the place in which he offers to vote is of necessity the place where he votes, if the offer is accepted, for the offer must be made to some one authorized to accept it; and when accepted the vote is complete; for the vote is by this section made the act of the elector himself; and when his offered ballot is accepted, there is no other act which he can perform to make it operative. That the township is a necessary place for the vital purpose of the law is manifest, for no offer to vote in any other township but that of the voter's residence is permitted by the constitution. And it being a necessary place for election purposes, and the only place which is referred to, it may be necessary to consider what purposes are to be subserved by any rules of locality; for we cannot be permitted to suppose that a restriction has been imposed without meaning; neither are we at liberty to disregard any word or phrase which has been inserted in the supreme law of the State.

"It has not been denied by any one, nor do I think it can be reasonably doubted, that the first impression any one would receive from reading this section would be that the voter must attend the election in his own township."

I have given from the opinion of the judges sufficient to show that they were very decided relative to the utter invalidity of the law, and that they made no discrimination in any elective office of or in the State. It was as well known to them as to us that Congressmen are elected by the same voters, and if, as it is said by Justice Christiancy, "the people must have understood both to deny every elector the right of voting at any other place than the township or ward of his residence, or while absent from such residence," I would ask in all sincerity, how can votes so cast be properly counted and allowed? Is this body to take this matter wholly from the control of the States? But the "bugbear" of State rights has been invoked, as if this would frighten men from their sense of propriety and arouse a spirit of determination to resist the State constitution and prostrate the salutary barriers the people have placed in their organic laws to protect the ballot-box. I trust the Congress of the United States will not, prior to the passage of some general law applicable to all the States, change from the practice that has long prevailed, assume to set aside the provisions of a State constitution, and ignore the decisions of a State court.

I might here leave my case and submit it for your arbitrament, were it not that I deemed the construction erroneous attempted to be put upon the Federal Constitution. I claim no perfection for my own views, but believing I have both the Federal and State Constitutions with me, as well as the precedents in election cases, I shall briefly continue my examination of the objections urged, and attempt their refutation. I do not pretend that all my citations of authorities are applicable to my entire case, but that from each can be gleaned principles tending to satisfy an impartial person that law and justice are with me. Neither do I pretend that any of the cases are precisely like the one under consideration, for until within the last four years we have had no laws in this country authorizing voting for Representatives in this House outside of the limits of a State. I am aware, too, that an adoption of some of the principles for which I contend will affect many individuals upon this floor; but the consciousness that I am right causes me to rise above all personal considerations, and regardless of the prejudices or interests of others give my own views upon the questions involved.

I shall insist, Mr. Speaker, that Congress, even under that provision of the Constitution authorizing this body to fix the "times" and "places" for holding elections, cannot fix that place outside of and beyond the State affected. Little is said upon this subject in the debates in the Convention to form the Federal Constitution. One of the rules for the construction of law, when a doubt may exist as to the meaning, is to examine the practices and the customs of the people at the time of its adoption. When the clause under consideration was placed in the Federal Constitution, our ancestors had just thrown off the yoke of England, and they were eagle-eyed in their endeavors to preserve the rights of the people. The members of that Convention had all been elected by the various State Legislatures; and, prior to the meeting of the first Congress under the Constitution, all the members of Congress had been so elected by the various colonial and the succeeding State Legislatures. When this provision was under discussion, the debates show it was the intention to have the Senate elected by the State Legislatures, and the House of Representatives directly by the people of the States; and to effectually secure this measure, it was provided that it should "be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States;" and to carry the election directly to them the clause that, "the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature," was inserted in the Federal Constitution. My view of this is that it was intended to include every disability that was imposed upon the electors of a representative in a State Legislature. In other words, that every person who could not vote for such representative was disqualified to vote for Representative in Congress, no matter from what cause this arose, and that voters were restricted to their homes in voting. In this view, "place" became an indispensable "qualification," equally with age, sex, color, or the possession of property.

Prior to the assembling of that Convention every member of the State Legislatures, from the earliest settlement of the various colonies, had been elected by the voters within their various townships and districts. Such a practice as has been adopted in many of the States recently was an unheard-of one. The manner in which their elections had been conducted at their various homes was in the minds of the members of that Convention, and though they were well informed of the fact of the supposed omnipotence of Parliament, and the general powers in many cases attempted to be exercised in various law-making bodies, their sole object appears to have been to bring voting directly home to the people, where every violation could be punished. The language they adopted, taken in connection with their customs, admits of no other construction, and permits no divided ballot-box.

As I have said, little can be found in the various debates in the national and State conventions to form and adopt the Constitution, that will enlighten us upon this subject, except in that of Massachusetts. In that body the provision authorizing Congress to fix the place of holding elections was severely animadverted upon by several of the members, and their fears were aroused that Congress might assume unreasonable and unjustifiable control over this matter. To show the understanding that then prevailed I wish to call your attention to a few extracts from the debates in that State, found in 2 Elliot's Debates, pages 59-61:

"Judge Sumner, in his remarks relative to this fourth section, demonstrated the absurdity of the supposition that Congress would remove the place of election to remote parts of the State, &c.

"Mr. West said, 'An argument which proves too much, it is said, proves nothing. Some say Congress may remove the place of election to the State of South Carolina; this is inconsistent with the words of the Constitution, which says, that the election in each State shall be prescribed by the Legislature thereof, &c., and that representation shall be apportioned according to numbers; it will frustrate the end of the Constitution, and is a reflection on the gentlemen who formed it.'

"Captain Snow said, 'It has been said, Mr. President, that there is too much power delegated to Congress by the section under consideration. I doubt it; I think power the hinge on which the whole Constitution turns. Gentlemen have talked about Congress moving the place of election from Georgia to the Mohawk river, but I never can believe it. I will venture to conjecture we shall have some honest men in our Congress. We read there were two who brought a good report, Caleb and Joshua. Now, if there are but two in Congress who are honest men, and Congress should attempt to do what the gentlemen say they will, (which will be high treason,) they will bring a report of it, and I stand ready to leave my wife and family, sling my knapsack, travel westward—to cut their heads off.'

These expressions of opinion of the power of Congress upon this subject are conclusive that they understood that the elections could be ordered to be held only within the limits of a State, and though an error was committed by one of the gentlemen in his reference to the clause, simply in the punctuation, yet their construction is plainly manifest—that the electors were to be restricted, as I have stated, to voting within the limits of their State. As both Congress and the State Legislatures derive their authority for fixing a place of voting from the same clause of the Federal Constitution, it follows, as a direct legitimate consequence, that if one body be restricted the disability inevitably applies to the other. From the tenor of the debate I have read, and the jealous spirit of our ancestors upon every question where their political rights and privileges were involved, I can assert without fear of successful contradiction that if an intimation had then been given that this innocent clause permitted either Congress or a State Legislature to order an election for one of the States in this Union beyond the bounds thereof, the adoption of the Constitution would have been jeopardized.

Still, it is insisted that a State Legislature may fix the "place" of voting without restriction, and I am aware that such has been the decision of the judicial tribunals of a few of the States. Such was the opinion of the judges in Michigan, if the Legislature had not been restrained by the State constitution. With all due deference to the able and learned gentlemen who have given those opinions, I shall most respectfully dissent from their conclusions.

According to the election laws of Michigan that have been in force for years, the place of holding an election is known six months previously to every voter in a town or ward, and he can prepare his business so as to be present at the "place" designated. According to the provisions of the soldiers' voting law the "place" is unknown until the moment of the opening of the polls, and then the knowledge of the fact could easily be confined to a favored few, thus defeating the ostensible object of the law. I will give the sections entire referring to this point:

"SEC. 2. Every soldier belonging to Michigan regiments and batteries or companies in the military service of this State or of the United States, or volunteer soldiers, residents of Michigan, belonging to regiments, batteries, or companies, present on the day of election from other States, including officers and their staffs, surgeons and assistant surgeons, chaplains and commissioners appointed under this act, shall, if possessed of the qualifications set forth in section one of this act, be entitled to the benefits of the provisions thereof.

"SEC. 7. At the elections herein provided for a poll shall be opened at every place, whether within or without the State, where a regiment, battalion, battery, or company of Michigan soldiers may be found, or stationed, and at such election all persons may vote who are thereto entitled by law and by the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 8. Any company, or detached portion of a regiment or companies, if not practicable for all to vote together, may open a separate poll, and the electors present shall choose from their number three inspectors of election, from the qualified electors present, whose duty it shall be to act.

"SEC. 9. The inspectors of election shall appoint the clerks of the election."

"SEC. 12. The polls shall be opened at sunrise, or as soon thereafter as practicable, and shall remain open at least three hours; and if necessary, in the opinion of the inspectors, in order to receive the ballots of all the electors, they may keep the polls open until five o'clock p.m., and no longer. Proclamation thereof shall be made at or before the opening of the polls, and one hour before closing them."

The foregoing sections contain all there is tending to inform persons as to where the place of election will be held. Can it be possible that under the clause of the Federal Constitution authorizing either the State Legislature or Congress to prescribe the "places" of holding the elections, such an uncertain, migratory poll as is here provided for was contemplated? I do not believe it. No such intention as this ever entered the minds of one of those stern patriots who participated in the formation of our national Constitution. When they inserted and adopted that provision they intended to confine the voting within the respective States, as the practice had prior thereto been, and not to permit Congress nor the State authorities to construct a perambulatory ballot-box that might traverse the habitable globe and be beyond the jurisdiction of State control.

I will go as far as any one in aiding, assisting, or caring for our gallant soldiers. I voted in the last Congress for almost every proposition for their benefit, or to ameliorate their condition; but our devotion to them does not require us to destroy all the safeguards our Constitution has provided for its protection and preservation. Our soldiers have gone forth with the patriotic object of sustaining the Constitution and Government; and it is not required of us that we shall strike a parricidal blow at that instrument, weaken it in one of its most essential parts to evince our frenzied devotion. They have not asked the sacrifice. It has been the work of enthusiasts—of demagogues. A true, devoted soldier only demands of us that we, in our various stations, should preserve the Government in its pristine purity at home, if possible, while he does his part in contending with armed foes upon the battlefield.

In this connection, before proceeding further with authorities in my own behalf, I will examine the arguments adduced and the authorities cited in opposing my claim. The whole reliance against me is upon that clause of the Federal Constitution providing "the times, places, &c., of holding elections, to be prescribed in each State by the Legislatures thereof." A fruitful theme of discussion might be here opened as to what constitutes a "Legislature" within the meaning of the Federal Constitution, as is suggested by the above-cited clause. If the passage of a bill is of no avail until the signature of the State Executive is obtained thereto, then these words lose all the potency attempted to be ascribed to them. If by the words is only meant the action of the Senate and House of Representatives of a State, then an act passed would have no validity under the constitution of Michigan, and none of the machinery requisite to put it in motion could be enforced, and it would require congressional legislation to give it that vitality. I do not propose to enlarge upon this subject, and having called your attention to it, I will proceed to the consideration of the other arguments employed.

It will have been observed that the whole reliance against me is based upon the clause I have last cited, and that places the whole action upon this matter in the hands of the Legislature, beyond the control of the people, speaking in their constitution. To do away with the effect of the decision in Michigan, the following extract from Justice Campbell's opinion is cited:

"The case is happily free from one class of questions which sometimes may introduce confusion. The ordinary disputes concerning the distribution of power between the people and their various departments and agencies of government do not arise in the present controversy. It is conceded that the power of regulating the time and manner of elections, and the places where they may be held, is one which is legislative in its nature and belongs to that body which is intrusted with the general legislative authority, unless the constitution has limited or destroyed this control over it. And we are only concerned, therefore, in determining whether the constitution of Michigan has prevented the State Legislature from exercising complete control over the locality of elections, and whether, if such control is limited, the limitation is applicable to the subject before us."

What consolation in opposition to my claim can be derived from this extract is more than I can divine. In attempting to make it applicable, the first portion is emphasized, and the clause "unless the constitution has limited or destroyed the control over it" is wholly ignored. Let me call your attention to the emphatic statement of the question by the judge, that they "were only concerned in determining whether the constitution of Michigan had prevented the Legislature from exercising complete control over the locality of elections," and the emphatic affirmative with which this pregnant question was answered. I have not pretended that if there were no restrictive words in our State constitution, but that the Legislature might provide for the holding an election anywhere in the district; but with those limitations they have no such power.

The case of Biddle and Richard vs. Wing, in Clarke and Hall's Election Cases, also cited, contains no principle applicable to the existing contest. That portion of the report relating to the position assumed by Richard is what is relied upon. An examination of the facts in this case shows that a number of Richard's friends, as he alleges, were deterred from voting by reason of the interference of the deputy sheriff and constables in the city of Detroit, under pretense of keeping the peace, and by that means he was prevented receiving a majority of the votes. There were three candidates, one, Wing, receiving 728 votes, another, Biddle, 732, and Richard 722. He did not pretend he had a majority, but that he would have had if it had not been for the interference of the officers. In their report the committee say:

"They are of the opinion that the duty assigned to them does not impose on them an examination of the causes which may have prevented any candidate from getting a sufficient number of votes to entitle him to a seat. They consider that it is only required of them to ascertain who had the greatest number of legal votes actually given at the election. An election is the act of selecting, on the part of the electors, a person for an office of trust."

No one can dispute the principle contained in this report; but where is its applicability to the present case? Because a row occurred at an election precinct, and voters were frightened away, and a committee believe they cannot go behind the election returns and inquire how men would have voted, but determine the case upon those actually given and so place that fact upon record, therefore, an argument is attempted to be adduced that votes cast in the southern States for a Michigan Congressman, in defiance of her constitution, if those voting would have been electors if at their homes in that State, are to be held valid. In the case cited, the committee distinctly say one of their duties is to ascertain who had the greatest number of "legal votes." In my case I am insisting that the soldiers' votes were not legal. If those electors were at the polls and had refrained from voting, they would none the less have been citizens and electors, and it is claimed that the soldiers who voted were electors of Michigan. Grant it. The members of this House are electors at their several places of residence, and if an election should take place during the session of Congress, they would none the less be electors, but on account of their absence from the polls they could not exercise the right conferred upon them. They neither gain nor lose a residence by their position; but while absent from their "town or ward" the exercise of the right is in abeyance. Scarcely an election has ever been held in any precinct but that some citizens, qualified voters therein, have been prevented by fortuitous circumstances the exercise of one of the greatest privileges conferred upon man. No valid argument can be gleaned from such an authority as this, adverse to the justice of my claim to a seat. It was well said by the court in Pennsylvania in the case of Chase vs. Miller:

"The learned judge deprecates a construction that shall disfranchise our soldiers. It strikes us that this is an inaccurate use of language. The constitution would disfranchise no qualified voter; but to secure purity of election, it would have its voters in the place where they are best known on election day. If a voter voluntarily stays at home or goes a journey, or joins the army of his country, can it be said that the constitution has disfranchised him? Four of the judges of this court, living in other parts of the State, find themselves on the day of every presidential election in the city of Pittsburg, where their official duties take them, and where they are not permitted to vote. Have they a right to charge the constitution with disfranchising them? Is not the truth rather this, that they have voluntarily assumed duties that are inconsistent with the right of suffrage for the time being? Such is our case, and such is the case with the volunteers in the Army. The right of suffrage is carefully preserved for both them and us, to be enjoyed when we return to the places which the constitution has appointed for its exercise. It is forcing a gratuitous assumption upon the constitution to treat it as intending that the volunteer in the public service shall carry his elective franchise with him where ever his duties require him to go."

A decision of the supreme court of Michigan, made at a recent term, involving the constitutionality of a law passed at the session of 1865, has also been referred to. The majority that passed one of the acts of that session was made up of several of the individuals who were elected by the votes of the soldiers, and who were admitted to seats in that body. The validity of that law was subsequently attacked for various reasons, and among them, one of the points was, that without the votes of those members elected by those cast beyond the State, the act would have been defeated. The court held, and very properly too, that they could not go back of the act for the purpose of examining into the qualifications of the members. The law books are full of cases justifying this doctrine, and, sir, it would be the height of folly to have any other rule prevail. The validity of the acts of those who assume to perform the functions of an office under a "color" of authority for the holding the same, are facts too well known to every legal gentleman in this House for me to waste time in their discussion. While a legislative body is made a "judge" of the qualifications of its members, and whether from mistake, ignorance, or corruption, as in the case I shall show, of Michigan, there is no power to go behind their acts and review their proceedings.

The action of the Michigan Legislature has also been adduced in behalf of my competitor, as affording a reason why this body should retain him in the seat. In the Michigan constitution is found the same provision that is contained in every one, I believe, in this country:

"That each House may judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its members;"

and that they construe as affording them the largest liberty for action in the premises. While I would not abridge any of the legitimate powers that a legislative body ought to possess, I contend the members are just as much bound by rules and established precedents as is a court of justice. Referring to the Federal Constitution, Judge Kent (1 Commentaries, 252,) says:

"Each House is made the sole judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members. The same power is vested in the British House of Commons, and in the Legislatures of the several States; and there is no other body known to the Constitution to which such a power might safely be trusted. It is requisite to preserve a pure and genuine representation, and to control the evils of irregular, corrupt, and tumultuous elections; and, as each House acts in those cases in a judicial character, its decisions ought to be regulated by known principles of law, and strictly adhered to for the sake of uniformity and certainty."

This is only a repetition of established law upon this subject; and to suit their own purposes a construction was given it by the Legislature of Michigan most unwarrantable and reprehensible. Before commenting upon that action, I will give a brief history of this law. It was first agitated during the session of 1863, and the proper committee of the House reported adversely to it. They say—

"There is no power in Michigan that can authorize the opening of election polls in any regiment, battalion, or company of Michigan soldiers while in the service of the General Government outside of the State."

And after exhausting the subject of its unconstitutionality, they close by saying—

"Your committee believe the passage of this bill would be unconstitutional as well as impracticable."

The bill failed, and passed over to the session of 1864, at which time, after much opposition, for the reason stated, it became a law. When the Legislature convened in 1865, ten members of the House and four of the Senate presented themselves as having been elected by the soldiers' vote, in accordance with its provisions. This was prior to the decision of the supreme court of Michigan. A few of the seats of those persons were contested in each House, but those having a majority of all the votes were admitted.

A few weeks after this the law was pronounced unconstitutional, and then all those elected by the home vote appeared and claimed their seats. The committee of the Senate to whom the matter was referred reported unanimously in favor of abiding by the decision of the court, and admitting the contestants. In their able report, giving their own as well as the opinion entertained upon this subject by all law-abiding people, they say:

"The contestants allege that the votes cast by virtue of that act are illegal, and rest their claims upon that point alone, and support their position by referring to a decision of the supreme court of our State pronouncing that act unconstitutional, and the votes cast under it void. If the decision is correct it should at once put an end to the controversy, for no man can acquire office by means of illegal votes." * * * "But the decision of our highest judicial tribunal as to the validity of the soldiers' suffrage law has been made, not at the instance of the court, but in the performance of a duty imposed by the constitution." * * * "The decision has become the rule of action, by which, by the requirements of the constitution, the people, the Executive, and the judiciary itself are to be guided." * * * "But in the judgment of your committee, the petitioners, whose names appear below, are entitled to the seats in question."

Yet, notwithstanding this unanimous report of the committee, by a tie vote in each case, three of the modest Senators voting each time, as it were, in his own case, the decision of the court was ignored.

In the House, a majority of the committee reported in favor of treating the decision as a nullity, basing that action principally upon the fact that that body had, at the commencement of the session, acted upon and adjudicated the question, and that they would not reconsider it. That I may do no injustice to their report, and to show the action of the Legislature can have no influence in my case, I will offer a few extracts:

"At the commencement of the present session it appeared by some of the certificates held by members, and petitions presented by contestants claiming seats, that the only grounds on which seats were contested was, that the law authorizing soldiers to vote when personally absent from the township in which they resided had been enacted by the Legislature in violation of the constitution of this State. This was the direct question and only question presented for the House to pass upon."

This House, in its judgment and decision, passed fully upon that question, and did judicially determine and declare that said law, entitled 'An act to enable the qualified electors of this State, in the military service, to vote at certain elections,' &c., was a valid law, and that the same was not a violation of the constitution. Under and by virtue of said judgment and decision, the rights of membership became vested in all those whose elections depended upon the votes cast under and by virtue of said law. And in the opinion of your committee the question has become res adjudicata, and should be adhered to by this legislative body with even more tenacity than is exhibited by courts of law in adhering to their judicial judgments and determinations."

Prior to the decision of the supreme court, this House had decided that the soldiers' vote should be permitted to take effect in four several cases.

"We neither offer to nor accept any challenge from them which may lead to a conflict. Our judgment must control as to the election of our members; their judgment by the law of the land will control the action of all the inferior courts, the executive officers of the State, and the people in all the private walks of life. The effect of their judgment will be that no election can again be held under the law in question, because the officers who carry on the machinery of an election are properly under the control, and must yield their judgment to that of the courts."

"But, believing the question to have been heretofore settled, finally adjudicated, they have directed their chairman to report the several petitions and accompanying documents, with the following preamble and resolutions, the resolutions being numbered from one to ten, inclusive:

"Whereas by the constitution of Michigan, the judicial power and authority to 'judge of qualifications, election, and return of members are vested in each House of the Legislature; and whereas at the commencement of this session, in judging of the election of members, whose right to seats in this House depended upon the legality and validity of the soldiers' vote under the act entitled 'An act to enable the qualified electors of this State, in the military service, to vote at certain elections,' &c., it was then judicially declared by this House, that said votes should be regarded in determining the question of election, upon which determination and decision members were admitted to seats on this floor: Therefore,

"1. Resolved, That in the opinion and judgment of this House, it would be a dangerous and unjustifiable exercise of power on the part of this body to revoke and set aside said determination and decision, and thereby eject from this House such members as may hold their seats by virtue of the soldiers' votes, cast in pursuance of the act above recited."

From the foregoing it appears they treated the whole subject as res adjudicata, and that it would be a dangerous proceeding for them to interfere with and review their acts. I have little comment to make at this time concerning this action of the Michigan Legislature. It has become a part of the history of our State. Suffice it to say, that the principle then established, if persisted in and accepted as a precedent in the future, would unsettle every equitable rule of action that ought to obtain in legislative bodies, and bring them, as it did that Legislature, into utter contempt. Though that

Legislature was three fourths Republican their action was not sustained by the party press in the State, and their leading paper even charged them with "lax morals" and dishonorable motives in admitting those members:

Extract from the Detroit Advertiser and Tribune, February, 1865.

"We suppose, however, that the time for argument and appeal are both passed, and that lax morals and reckless partisan leadership have placed the Legislature, even while we now write, in an irretrievably false position. If so, it is a matter of proud consciousness that the Republican masses are uncontaminated. They will submit to the decision of the highest court of the State and repudiate the men who defy it. Every member of the Legislature who votes to defy the decision of the supreme court thereby digs his political grave and sets up his tombstone. He may take a long farewell of all his ambitions. The people could forgive his error and infatuation, were it not that so infirm a judgment and feeble a moral sense must ever render his elevation a public danger. We make no menace or forge no malediction, but claim to speak in the voice of prophecy that which is inevitable."

A distinction has also been made between the power of the people in forming a State constitution and that of the Legislature created by it, deriving its authority from its provisions, and acting under it. It is asserted that the Legislature have full authority, derived from the Federal Constitution, irrespective and in defiance of the provisions or limitations in a State constitution, to fix the place of voting where they please, and that the people, in their organic law, cannot make that "place" of voting a qualification without infringing the Federal Constitution. To sustain this theory no adjudicated authority can be found, and the only reference of any weight is in one of the sections of Story, in which he is merely giving the language of the Federal Constitution. Taking his whole chapter, the true meaning is, that what was intended in giving the State Legislature power to fix the time and "place," was simply conferring it upon the law-making power of a State. In referring to qualifications, Story says:

"Upon this clause, which was possibly adopted by a unanimous vote, the Federalist has remarked, 'the provision made by the Convention appears to be the best that lay within their option. It must be satisfactory to every State, because it is conformable to the standard already established by the State itself. It will be safe to the United States because, being fixed by the State constitutions, it is not alterable by the State government, and it cannot be feared that the people of the States will alter this part of their constitution in such a manner as to abridge their rights, secured to them by the Federal Constitution.'"—Section 586.

This extract I give to show both the opinion of Judge Story and the authors of the Federalist, that this whole power of defining "qualifications" was to be left in the care of the people of the States, to be incorporated in their organic law, and to be beyond the reach of their Legislatures. This extract must also be taken in connection with what is said in the subsequent section as to the Legislatures controlling the time and places of elections. In a note reference is made to the fact "that though in New England the voters generally give their votes in the townships where they reside, in the southern and western States there are few towns and the elections are held in counties," &c. I deem this unanswerable in giving a true meaning to the text, and that it was never intended to make a mere Legislature above the people, and allow power to be exercised for the election of a Representative in Congress that they were debarred from using for all other purposes.

To further sustain this opinion, I cite Curtis on the Constitution, 200:

"If the right of voting for any class of Federal officers were to be in each State the same as that given by the State laws for the election of any class of State officers, it was quite essential that the States should surrender to the General Government the power to determine as to persons of foreign birth." * * * "The committee of detail, after a review of all these considerations, presented a scheme that was well adapted to meet the difficulties of the case. They proposed that the same persons who by the laws of the several States were admitted to vote for members of the most numerous branch of their own Legislatures should have the right to vote for the Representatives in Congress." * * * "If then the State constitutions would refrain from imposing on the electors a property qualification for the very purpose of including all to whom the States might concede the right of voting within their respective limits," &c.

This all proves conclusively that it was the intention of the framers of the Federal Constitution that the entire subject of elections and qualifications be remitted to the control of the people of the several States, to be exercised by them as their judgment should dictate, and if they placed any restrictions, conditions, or qualifications in their constitutions, the Legislature was debarred from removing them.

As early as 1811 a case was decided in the supreme court of Massachusetts involving this question of qualifications. In the opinion of the court, given by Chief Justice Parker, is the following:

"But the qualifications of electors are settled by the constitutions of the United States and of this Commonwealth, and there is no power, while those constitutions remain, to add to or diminish from those qualifications."

"By the Constitution of the United States, the electors of a Representative in Congress are to have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature; and by the constitution of this State, one of the qualifications for an elector of a Representative is a residence in the town where he gives his vote for the space of one year next preceding an election."—11 Massachusetts, 433.

And in the case already cited from Pennsylvania, 5 Wright, 424, the court in giving the opinion said:

"These legislative regulations of residence are in accordance with that interpretation of the Constitution suggested above, and show clearly how essentially the place of voting has entered into the qualifications of suffrage."

Such has always been the doctrine, and no court, nor any legislative body, has prior to this attempted to distinguish between a "qualification," a "condition," or a "requisite" of voting until it became essential to prevent my obtaining the seat to which I am justly entitled. The Federal and State Constitutions have been taken and construed together as one.

Another reply to the theory assumed is, that for three fourths of a century during which our Government has existed under the Constitution, no attempt has been made by any State Legislature, I believe, to make a distinction between the two classes of electors. It has always been held that a man, debarred from any cause from voting for one, could not vote for the other. And while this question of permitting soldiers to vote in the field has been agitated, no distinction has been made in any State so far as I can learn between these two classes. Many of the courts of the various States have held these laws unconstitutional; sometimes a veto has intervened to arrest them, but no ingenuity, until my case arose, has tortured this provision of the Federal Constitution into making a distinction so that an elector could vote for a Congressman and not for a State officer.

Permit me to suggest that if a distinction is to be made, ought it not to be in a law specially adapted to the purpose? The Michigan law was not passed merely to enable soldiers to vote for Representatives in Congress, but it was a general election law for all State, county, and district officers, with no reference in it to a Congressman, except in giving the manner of making the returns. It was not passed by the "Legislature," as defined in the theory of my opponents, but by the law-making power of the State—the Senate, the House, with the approval of the Governor; the latter requirement indispensable to make it a law in Michigan, but it seems, not within the purview of the Federal Constitution.

If that Constitution is to govern in a case of this kind, and that of Michigan to be ignored, I ask in all sincerity, how you reconcile this intervention of our Governor in aiding the passage of this law? It either was or was not necessary. If the former, the law is not such as is contemplated by the Federal Constitution, and the State constitution must control. If the latter, as the law was only a State affair, incidentally referring to Congressmen, and impossible to be enforced except through the intervention of State laws and State authorities, therefore I again repeat, it was not such as was contemplated by the Federal Constitution. Take either horn of the dilemma, and your law fails.

There is another question connected with this law to which I will call your attention. By the adverse decision of the supreme court of Michigan, it, for any purpose, is no authority. The report of the House committee, which I have already quoted, referring to it, contains the following:

"The effect of their judgment will be that no election can again be held under the law in question, because the officers who carry on the machinery of an election are properly under the control and must yield their judgment to that of the courts."

The author of this has just been confirmed as a United States district attorney, and he is a lawyer of some eminence in western Michigan. Admit Mr. Trowbridge, and your action will present this anomalous feature: a member is received under a law continuing unrepealed, but by the circumstances surrounding it no subsequent votes can again be cast for another member of this House. It is not for me to unravel this web or remedy the difficulty; I take the law and the fact as the record presents them.

Many other nice distinctions and discriminations are urged in opposition to my claim. My experience in life has taught me that no legal or constitutional question has yet arisen but that it has found advocates for the most whimsical, fantastic, and forced construction. Unfortunately for me, a partisan political question has become involved with the facts in this case; and though individuals may honestly labor to rid themselves of its deleterious influence in adjudicating the matter, yet we all know the potency of preconceived ideas, and the murky atmosphere with which every object is surrounded that is examined while under their influence. I cannot follow all these refinements through their various ramifications. Suffice it to say, where there is a will there is a way, and an ingenious, inquisitive person, if inclined, can always satisfy himself in giving the most sophistical of reasons in justification of his action in any given case. I care not what effect such reasoning may have upon this House, or how prejudicial to my cause it may be, in my opinion I believe no sufficient reason has been or can be presented why my opponent should be entitled to retain his seat.

Having fully examined the various objections, I will now call your attention to a few adjudicated cases.

The question immediately involved in the present case has before this been twice before Congress, and in both cases decided in accordance with the principles for which I am contending. I believe those decisions were strictly correct, and that none other could have been made consonant with the intentions of the framers of our Government. The same general idea that the State constitutions were paramount in prescribing the place of holding an election pervades and controls in election cases extending back over fifty years. It is a well-established maxim in law that "principles should govern," and that State courts should construe and control State constitutions. The Michigan State court has construed the State constitution and rejected the votes cast as were cast against me. I will cite and comment upon the following cases to show the rule that this body has heretofore followed.

In Farlee vs. Runk, arising in 1844, in the Twenty-Ninth Congress, it appeared that by counting certain votes cast by students at Princeton, Mr. Runk had a majority. A law of New Jersey was passed March 18, 1844, prohibiting students from voting except at their place of residence.

During the same year a new constitution was adopted, and in the article on suffrage were provisions more liberal than those contained in the statutes. This constitution went into effect September 2, 1844, and in the November following an election was held, and the students of that institution voted, and Mr. Runk received sixteen majority. Here was a direct conflict between the law of the Legislature of March, 1844, and the constitution of the State of September, 1844, and was so treated and considered by the committee. The question of this conflict was brought before the Committee of Elections, a committee presided over by the late Vice President Hamlin, and in their report upon the matter they say:

"Under this statute the materialist alleges that the students were expressly prohibited from voting at said election.

"Your committee entertain a decided opinion to the contrary; for in the first place all doubt is at once removed by the conclusive circumstance that the said act was passed the 13th day of March, 1844, and the new constitution under which this election was held went into operation in September, 1844. The election taking place in November, 1844. The new constitution (the fundamental law) was adopted after that act, and the election was held after the adoption of the new constitution."

Other questions arose in the case, but this distinct one of a conflict between the act of the Legislature and a provision of the State constitution was expressly considered and decided by the committee, and no abstruse nor far-fetched dogmas were permitted to override the organic law of the people, for the committee expressly say in speaking of the legislative enactment:

"That section of the act was, in the opinion of your committee, clearly repugnant to the new constitution, and of course not in force."

I now call your attention particularly to the Oregon case, the one referred to in both the majority and minority reports. With all due deference to the author of the majority report, I cannot perceive how he makes it harmonize with his conclusion in this cause. I cannot on this occasion make more than a brief reference to this Oregon case; but I will present sufficient for a clear understanding of it.

At an election held in June, 1860, in accordance with the constitution of Oregon, Mr. Shiel was elected. The Legislature of that State attempted to change the law of election so as to have it alternate in November of the year of a presidential election, and the alternate election biennially in June. For some reason this plan failed; but in November, 1860, votes were cast for Mr. Thayer and he received the certificate of election. Now, it will be observed if the Legislature had passed the law making the proposed change, then that case and mine would have presented the precise points, but as it was the chairman of the Committee of Elections, the same gentleman who now holds the like position, speaking for the committee, in his able report went into a full examination of the question, and debated the point as to the power of a Legislature in making a change, and he argued it the same as if there were a conflict between them, and gave his reasons, reasons clear, honest, patriotic, and unanswerable, why a State constitution should not be considered a mere rope of sand to be trampled upon and set aside by a mere legislative body deriving its life, its existence, and all its authority from the constitution it seeks to condemn. That no injustice may be done I make a full extract:

"The committee are of opinion that the election held for Representative in Congress on the first Monday in June, 1860, was held in pursuance of, and in conformity with, the constitution and laws of Oregon, and that consequently the contestant is entitled to the seat." "Notwithstanding this constitutional provision, that general elections shall be held on the first Monday of June biennially, the Legislature of Oregon seems to have believed that it had power to fix another time for the election of Representative in Congress."

"The committee have not deemed it necessary to determine what those reasons are for. With all due respect to the opinions of the gentlemen composing that Legislature, they are of opinion that this House must, nevertheless, be the final judge of the meaning of this clause of the constitution of Oregon. And, for the reason stated, the committee have no doubt that the constitution of the State has fixed, beyond the control of the Legislature, the time for holding an election for Representative in Congress, at the general election, so held in pursuance of the constitution, the contestant was duly elected. And in the debate in the House on this case, Mr. Dawes said, 'It occurs to me, sir, that that provision of the Constitution of the United States which says that the time and place shall be specified by the Legislature of each State meant simply that they should be fixed by the constituted authority of the State until Congress itself should fix a time for the election in all the States.'"

It will be observed that this was not the language of the chairman but of the committee, and that, after due examination of the case, "they have no doubt that the constitution of the State has fixed beyond the control of the Legislature the time of holding an election for Representative in Congress."

Change time for place, and the case is identical with my own, and I have no doubt that the constitution of Michigan "has placed beyond the control of its Legislature the place of electing a Representative in Congress."

This was in 1861. Since that we have been making rapid strides. We live in a progressive age. When those cases were before this House State constitutions were of some avail, and their provisions were regarded as all-important. It had not then been attempted to enervate, emasculate, States, but the decisions of their courts, the reserved rights of the people, were paramount. I hope the Congress of the United States will still regard the decisions of the past, and at least hesitate before a new rule be established from which may spring a direful progeny of errors.

In concluding my remarks, I submit the following propositions:

1. That by the Constitution of the United States, and that of Michigan as defined by her supreme court, I had a majority of the legal voters.

2. That from the organization of our Government until 1861 it had never been supposed by any party, nor contended in any State, that a State Legislature had power to order an election outside of and beyond the bounds of a congressional district.

3. That long-continued practice in a particular manner, under a constitutional provision, is authoritative in construing the same; and as the various States had pursued for nearly eighty years the restrictive course of confining the voters to their home voting places, it affords an authority in my behalf difficult to be overcome.

4. That in giving effect to a constitutional provision we must look into the history of the times when it was framed, to ascertain what object its authors had in view; and if at that time all electors were restricted to their home voting places, it becomes an almost unanswerable fact that the construction upon which I rely is the correct one.

5. That the provision in the Federal Constitution authorizing the State Legislatures to fix the times and places for holding congressional elections is to be governed by the preceding proposition, and to be construed by reference to the practice prevailing at the time of its adoption.

6. That in defining the qualifications of electors it was the intention of the framers to leave this whole subject with the people of the several States, allowing them to act as their judgment should dictate, and fix such prerequisites as qualifications as they deemed essential to guard the ballot-box and preserve the purity of elections.

7. That the people of Michigan, in their organic law to protect their rights and as effectually as possible to prevent fraud, without distinction of office, made the voting in the "township or ward" an indispensable qualification of an elector.

8. That from the authorities I have shown, the "place" of voting has, when required, ever been held a qualification, and as it was so made by the constitution of Michigan, and the Federal Constitution requires like qualifications for electors of Representatives in Congress as is required for the State Legislature, it clearly follows that in Michigan no valid votes can be cast beyond the limits of a township or ward by a voter resident therein.

9. That Congress, by setting aside this provision, and allowing votes cast by Michigan soldiers then in other States to control an election for Congress, when those votes are void for every officer within the State, will weaken that respect for law and order that ought to be inculcated and to prevail in every free community.

10. That it is the duty of every class of people to respect the decisions of the highest judicial tribunal of a State upon a question legitimately brought before it, and though its decision be contrary to our prejudices, our judgment, or our wishes, yet it should be sustained as long as it is the constitutional exposition of the law of the land.

11. That it is the duty of this Congress to be governed in adjudicating litigated cases by the established rules laid down by the courts as well as this body; and that, as the case of Farlee vs. Runk, in 1844, involved a question of conflict between the constitution of the State of New Jersey and an enactment of its Legislature, in fixing a "place" for voting; and as the report of the honorable chairman in the Oregon case in 1861 announced the opinion of the committee upon the effect of an attempt by the Legislature of Oregon to change the "time," held that these questions were settled by the organic law of the State, and were beyond the control of the Legislature, I therefore insist they each contain the essential characteristic of my own case, and they have settled in my favor the principles by which this House ought to be governed.

And lastly, if one of the foregoing propositions be true, my right to the seat is placed beyond a doubt.

Mr. SMITH. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] desire that this business shall come up after or before the morning hour to-morrow?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I desire to have it hold its place.

The SPEAKER. Then it will come up immediately after the reading of the Journal, to the exclusion of all other business.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. TAYLOR. I ask indefinite leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. HUBBELL.

No objection being made, leave was granted.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. GLOSSBRENNER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 33) for the relief of Charlotte Bence, widow of Philip H. Bence, late captain of company F, thirtieth regiment Iowa volunteer infantry; when the Speaker signed the same.

DISCONTINUANCE OF EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. STEVENS. As I do not learn that anybody wishes to speak to-night I ask the consent of the House that the evening sessions for the remainder of this week be dispensed with, or until further ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has asked several gentlemen on the list if they wish to speak, and he has found none that desire to do so this evening.

No objection being made, evening sessions were discontinued until further order.

LAND TITLES IN ST. LOUIS.

Mr. THAYER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, asked leave to report back House bill No. 15, authorizing documentary evidence of titles to be furnished to the owners of certain lands in the city of St. Louis, with an accompanying report, and to have the bill recommitted to the same committee, and the report printed.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

Mr. SMITH. I now renew the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken; and there were upon a division—ayes 44, noes 57.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. SMITH called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SMITH and SCOFIELD were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 44.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, presented a memorial of citizens of Indiana and Illinois, remonstrating against the restoration of any State lately in rebellion until adequate security has been obtained against a renewed attempt to secede, against any representation in Congress beyond a just proportion of the voting population, against any payment of the rebel debt or for emancipated slaves, and against any distinctions in State constitutions on account of color or descent; and praying for such an amendment of the Constitution of the United States as will enforce the foregoing provisions; which was referred to the joint committee to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States of America.

Gaston, late adjutant of the sixteenth regiment Virginia volunteers, who is represented to have died from disease contracted while in the service of the United States, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of Delaware county, Pennsylvania, praying for an amendment of the Constitution which will forever prevent any State from making any distinction in civil rights and privileges on account of race, color, or descent; which was referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

He also presented three petitions of citizens of New England, praying that in the adoption of any measures establishing a new basis of representation there may be no distinction in the qualification of voters on account of race or color; which were referred to the committee to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States of America.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present a petition from women of the United States, asking for an amendment of the Constitution that shall prohibit the several States from disfranchising any of their citizens on account of sex. I present this petition at this time, as it has been sent to me for this purpose; but I take the liberty of saying that I do not think this a proper time for the consideration of that question. I move its reference to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the petition of Thomas F. Wilson, United States consul at Bahia, Brazil, praying for compensation for losses alleged to have been sustained by him in consequence of his being compelled to abandon the consulate by the action of the Brazilian Government; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented two memorials of citizens of Michigan, remonstrating against the restoration of any State lately in rebellion until adequate security has been obtained against a renewed attempt to secede, against any representation in Congress beyond a just proportion of the voting population, against any payment of the rebel debt or for emancipated slaves, and against any distinctions in State constitutions on account of race, color, or descent, and praying for such amendments to the Constitution of the United States as will enforce the foregoing provisions; which were referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. CRAGIN presented the petition of George W. Johnson, and others, citizens of Buffalo, New York, praying for the adoption of the proposed constitutional amendment that no State shall make any distinction in civil rights and privileges among naturalized citizens of the United States within its limits, or among persons born on its soil of parents permanently resident there, on account of race, color, or descent; which was referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

He also presented the petition of Washington Crosland, praying for compensation for damages alleged to have been occasioned by the seizure and use of his property in St. Louis, Missouri, by the United States authorities for railroad purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOWE presented the memorial of J. W. Warren, of Albany, Wisconsin, praying for compensation for damages alleged to have been sustained by him in consequence of the rescinding of the acceptance of his bid by the Postmaster General to carry the mail on the route from Mill Haven to Grand Rapids, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to present a petition, in the form of a letter, of George W. Lewis, treasurer of the Union Horse Shoe Company, of Providence, Rhode Island, with reference to taxation of the product of the concern in which he is treasurer; and I desire to read a portion of it:

"As stated, the present revenue tax on spikes, nails, rivets, and nuts, articles of about the same value and cost as horse and mule shoes, cables, and toe-calks, pay a tax of $2 40 per ton, while the articles of shoes, toe-calks, and cables pay a tax of six per cent., equal to ten or twelve dollars per ton. We think it impossible to assign a reason why one should pay a greater tax than the other."

I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

STATE OF TENNESSEE.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the memorial of J. Edward Cooper, Horace Maynard, John W. Leftwich, and William B. Stokes, who claim to be Representatives-elect from the State of Tennessee to the House of Representatives, in which they represent that by the operation of the recent rebellion the officers of that State abdicated their offices, and left the government without any agents to carry it on; that in this attitude of affairs one of their citizens, Andrew Johnson, was, on the 3d of March, 1862, by the President of the United States appointed military governor of the State, which office he continued to hold until the 3d of March, 1865. To remedy this state of things, the loyal people of the State of Tennessee, by their delegates, assembled on the 8th of January, 1865, in convention, at the capital of the State, Nashville, to take such steps as wisdom might direct to restore the State of Tennessee to its once honored status in the great national Union. Certain amendments were proposed to the State constitution, made necessary, in the opinion of the convention, by the altered relations of slavery, and by the action of persons engaged in the rebellion, who had temporarily usurped the machinery of the State government, and by the vacancy of the several State offices, for the filling of which there was at that time no provision by law. These amendments to the constitution the convention submitted to the vote of their constituents on the 22d of February, 1865, and they were by them adopted. While these proceedings met with the concurrence and coöperation of the military governor, they were the spontaneous action of the loyal people of Tennessee. Having thus provided the reorganization of the government under her preëxisting constitution so amended, the work was completed by the election of a Governor and Legislature on the 4th of March following, and on the 5th of April they entered upon the duties of their respective offices.

A copy of the several amendments incorporated into the organic law of the State, and of the proceedings of the Legislature at its first session, certified officially by the Secretary of State and published by authority, are herewith appended and adopted as a part of the memorial. The government so organized has been unresisted and has had uninterrupted jurisdiction of the State since. The memorialists respectfully submit that the government is republican in form as well as in spirit, and they ask that it may be recognized and its perpetuity guaranteed as the true and proper government of the State of Tennessee, entitled to the same immunities and prerogatives as the State enjoyed by virtue of an act of Congress approved on the 1st of June, 1796, until her relations with the Government were disturbed by the treason of a portion of the people.

I move that the memorial and the accompanying constitutional amendments and legislative proceedings be referred to the joint committee of fifteen.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John Ahern, praying to be indemnified for loss on his contract with the acting assistant provost marshal general of the northern division of New York, for board and rations furnished to soldiers and recruits for the United States Army at the city of Albany, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

No. 57) authorizing the Secretaries of War and Navy to place hulks and vessels at the disposal of commissioners of quarantine or other proper authorities at ports of the United States; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

Bence, late captain of company F, thirtieth regiment Iowa volunteer infantry; which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore.

METROPOLITAN INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. WILLEY. If there be no further morning business, I move that the Senate take up the bill (S. No. 98) to incorporate the Metropolitan Fire and Marine Insurance Company of the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It proposes to declare William E. Spalding, John Van Reswick, Charles W. Boteler, jr., Augustus E. Perry, James L. Barbour, George W. Corcoran, Thomas P. Morgan, H. A. Chadwick, James Y. Davis, F. A. Lutz, Samuel P. Brown, John L. Kidwell, William Galt, John M. Barclay, John F. Ellis, William M. Shuster, John F. Callan, James T. Close, Charles Kloman, Frederick Koonen, and John B. Turton, and their present and future associates, a body politic and corporate by the name and style of the Metropolitan Fire and Marine Insurance Company of the District of Columbia, with the usual powers of a corporation, with a capital stock of ten thousand shares of $100 each.

The Committee on the District of Columbia reported the bill with an amendment to strike out all of the bill after the second section, in the following words:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the affairs of this company shall be managed by a board of nine directors, to be elected annually from among the stockholders, and to continue in office until successors be chosen; five of whom shall be a quorum for transacting business, but a smaller number may adjourn from time to time. SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That within twenty days after the passage of this act, the persons named therein, or any five of them, shall, after ten days' public notice, open books of subscription to the capital stock of the company, and as soon as ten thousand shares shall have been subscribed for, the stockholders shall be called together, by a notice of at least ten days in some Washington newspaper, when they shall proceed to the organization of the company.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the stock of said corporation shall not be less than $100,000, and may at any time hereafter be increased, at the pleasure of said corporation, to any sum not exceeding $1,000,000, and shall be divided into shares of $100 each; and each subscriber to said capital stock shall, at the time of subscribing therefor, pay into the treasury of said corporation an installment of twenty dollars on each share of said stock by him subscribed; and shall, before said corporation shall commence business, secure the payment of the remaining eighty dollars on each share by him so subscribed, either by mortgage or mortgages of real estate, or by indorsed promissory note or notes, or by pledge of bonds or stocks as collateral security, said mortgages, notes, bonds, and stocks to be approved in writing by the directors of said corporation, and two thirds of the corporators herein named; and said corporation shall at all times have a lien upon the stock of such stockholder for all indebtedness of such stockholder to said corporation; and said securities shall, in all cases, be payable in such installments and at such stated periods as said directors may require, in and by a call or calls published in one or more of the newspapers published in the city of Washington: which said notes and mortgages shall in no case be sold or transferred by said corporation for a sum less than the par value thereof in cash: Always provided, That the call for the first installment upon said securities shall be published at least thirty days before the said installment is payable. SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize the said corporation to issue any note, token, device, scrip, or other evidence of debt, to be used as a currency.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That it may be lawful for Congress hereafter to alter, modify, or repeal the foregoing act.

Mr. WILLEY. I move to amend the amendment in section three, lines sixteen and seventeen, by striking out after the word "corporation" the words "and two thirds of the incorporators herein named;" so that it will read:

Said mortgages, notes, bonds, and stocks to be approved in writing by the directors of said corporation, and said corporation shall have at all times a lien upon the stock, &c.

I think the object is sufficiently secured without repeating those words.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was adopted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 66) relative to the courts and post office of New York city, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

STURGEON BAY SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 85.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill (S. No. 85) granting to the State of Wisconsin a donation of public lands to aid in the construction of a breakwater and harbor and ship-canal at the head of Sturgeon bay, in the county of Door, in said State, to connect the waters of Green bay with Lake Michigan, in said State, was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for granting to the State of Wisconsin, for the purpose of aiding that State in constructing and completing a breakwater and harbor and ship-canal to connect the waters of Green bay with the waters of Lake Michigan, two hundred thousand acres of public lands, to be selected in subdivisions agreeably to the United States survey, by an agent or agents appointed by the Governor of the State, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, from lands subject to private entry. The selections are to be made from sections of land nearest the location of the harbor and canal not otherwise appropriated, and not from lands designated by the United States as "mineral" nor from lands to which the rights of preemption or homestead have attached. The lands granted are to be subject to the disposal of the Legislature of the State, or, if the Legislature shall not be in session, or shall adjourn within ten days after the passage and approval of the act, they are to be subject to the disposal of the Governor and board of commissioners of school, university, and swamp lands of the State. The canal is to be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or charge upon the vessels of the Government or upon vessels employed by it in the transportation of any property or troops of the United States.

Before it shall be competent for the State to dispose of any of the lands, the plan of the breakwater and harbor and the route of the canal shall be established, and a plat or plats thereof filed in the office of the War Department, and a duplicate filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. If the breakwater, harbor, and canal, shall not be completed within three years from the passage of the act the lands granted and remaining unsold are to revert to the United States.

The Legislature of the State is to cause to be kept an accurate account of the sales and net proceeds of the lands granted, and of all expenditures in the construction, repairs, and operating of the canal, and of its earnings, and to return a statement of the same annually to the Secretary of the Interior. Whenever the State shall be fully reimbursed for all advances made for the construction, repairs, and operating of the canal, with legal interest on all advances until the reimbursement of the same, or upon payment by the United States of any balance of such advances over such receipts from the lands and canal, with interest, the State is to be allowed to tax for the use of the canal only such tolls as shall be sufficient to pay all necessary expenses for the care, charge, and repair of the same.

The first amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was in section one, line twelve, after the words "made from" to insert "alternate and odd-numbered," so as to read, "that said selections shall be made from alternate and odd-numbered sections of land nearest the location of said harbor," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add at the end of the bill, as section six, the following:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That said ship-canal shall be at least one hundred feet in width, with a depth of water not less than thirteen feet.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know something about the bill. Where does it come from, and what are the peculiar reasons for making a grant of land to a State for the purpose of building a canal and breakwater? It seems to be rather a new thing.

Mr. HOWE. No, Mr. President, it is not a new thing, not a new thing either to the Senate or to Congress. A bill passed this body making an appropriation of land for this identical work at the last session, and during the last session another bill passed making a grant of lands to the State of Michigan for precisely such a work at the Portage near Lake Superior. Sturgeon bay, which makes out of Green bay, at its head comes within about a mile and a quarter of Lake Michigan. A cut of a mile and a quarter in length will enable vessels to pass from the waters of Green bay to lake Michigan, and it will save to the commerce between those two sheets of water a distance of about one hundred miles. Besides that, it will make a harbor of refuge for all the commerce on the lake and the bay both, where such a harbor is very much needed, at a point where there is not a harbor within eighty or ninety miles. The Committee on Public Lands have unanimously recommended this measure at this session as they did the last session, and the Senate then agreed to it. It did not, however, get through the other House, but both Houses of Congress agreed to just such a grant for just such a work in the State of Michigan. The committee were entirely satisfied of the importance of this work and the propriety of it, and the bill appropriates land and not money, and it requires the work to be completed within three years. It appropriates land which you have, instead of money which you have not. Land we have and can spare; money we are a little short of. It effects the double purpose of building a canal between these two sheets of water and furnishing a harbor.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 57) authorizing the Secretaries of War and Navy to place hulks and vessels at the disposal of commissioners of quarantine or other proper authorities at ports of the United States, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 66) relative to the courts and post office of New York city, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

JANE W. NETHAWAY.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 115.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 115) for the relief of Jane W. Nethaway was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension rolls the name of Jane W. Nethaway, of the town of Ohio, county of Herkimer, and State of New York, widow of David Nethaway, late of the eighty-first regiment New York volunteers; the pension to begin on the 20th day of September, 1864, and to continue during her widowhood, at the rate allowed by law to the widow of a first lieutenant. It also proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle and adjust the accounts of David Nethaway, late of the eighty-first regiment New York volunteers, as a second lieutenant, from June 3, 1864, to August 11, 1864, inclusive, and as a first lieutenant from August 12, 1864, to September 29, 1864, inclusive.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States, upon which the Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor. The Chair would correct an error into which he fell yesterday in deciding that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] at the time he proposed it, was not in order. In the opinion of the Chair, on consideration, it was in order; and that is the pending question.

Mr. HENDERSON resumed and concluded the speech which he began yesterday. [It will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. WILLIAMS obtained the floor.

Mr. POMEROY. With the consent of the Senator from Oregon, I move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. SUMNER. Let us go into executive session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope not. We never shall get through at this rate. Two or three days of this week have been spent already. If my friend from Oregon would rather speak in the morning, the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK,] who rose at the same moment, is perfectly ready to go on this evening. If my friend from Oregon will give way, or prefers speaking in the morning, the Senator from New Hampshire will go on now. It is of no sort of use to keep going on in this way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am willing to give way to the Senator from New Hampshire to go on this afternoon.

Mr. POMEROY. Then I withdraw the motion.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, we are now considering (for that is the real question) whether we shall recommend to the States of the Union an amendment of the Constitution granting to all the people of this country, both white and black, the right of suffrage; and as I state this question to the Senate, I cannot help recurring to what occurred in the Senate of the United States about six years ago. As the traveler who has passed a difficult road, when he comes to some high hill looks back to see the difficulties which he has passed, I turn back, and I ask the Senate to turn back, to consider what occurred, as I say, about six years ago.

In the session of 1859-60, in the old Senate Chamber, a bill was brought into the Senate of the United States by the then Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. Brown,) who was chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, a place which my friend from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] now so worthily fills—a bill in aid of the education of the children of this District. The bill proposed to grant certain fines and forfeitures to the use of the schools, and also proposed to tax the people ten cents on every hundred dollars of the property in this District for the purpose of educating the children. That bill proposed to tax the white man and the black man alike, and fearing that the property of the black man would be taxed to educate the child of the white man I proposed an amendment to the bill (that the tax collected from the black man should go to educate the black man's child. There was also a further provision of the bill that if the District raised a certain amount of money for the education of the children the Government of the United States would appropriate a like amount from the Treasury. If, for instance, you raised $20,000 by taxes on the people in the District, the Government should pay $20,000 more to be added to it for the education of the children of the District. I moved the amendment that no child whose father paid any portion of that tax for the education of the children should be excluded from the benefit of it, be he white or black; but that there might be no inconvenience felt I agreed to an amendment that the black child should not be put into the same school with the white child, but that they should be educated in different schools to be provided for them; but if the black man paid for educating the children of the District his child should be educated. There was at once an outcry, "Why, this is social equality;" and they would not consent that the black child should be educated, even with the money of the black father.

That amendment was declared to be carried in the Senate of the United States, and after declaring it was carried the Senate adjourned, and after the adjournment the chairman of that committee, Mr. Brown, appealed to me personally if I would not withdraw it. I said to him "No, I would never withdraw it; if you tax the black man, the black man should have a part of the money that you raise from him to educate his child."

After some days the bill came up again in the Senate of the United States, and the Senator from Mississippi, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, got up and in open Senate appealed to me, "Will the Senator from New Hampshire withdraw that amendment?" "Never, Mr. President." "Then," said the Senator from Mississippi, "I will lay the bill aside, and will not ask the Senate to pass it;" and so the whole scheme failed, because they would not consent that the money of the black man should educate his own child, and they could not vote it to educate a white child.

Now I turn back to that time six years ago, and I mark the road that we have come along. I mark where we struck the chains from the black man in this same District, whose child you could not educate six years ago. I mark in this Senate, at this very session, that we have passed a bill in aid of the Freedmen's Bureau to secure to him his rights in this District. I mark that all through this nation we have stricken off the chains of the slave and secured to the slave his rights elsewhere in the Union; and we have now come to the height of the hill and are considering whether we will not enfranchise those very black men through all the country.

Mr. President, when that bill, to which I have referred, was pending in the Senate of the United States, Mr. Mason, then a Senator from Virginia, who occupied relatively the same position in the old Chamber that my friend from New York [Mr. HARRIS] occupies here, got up and stated unblushingly and openly in the Senate of the United States—I think my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] will remember it—that it always had been the policy of the State of Virginia, his "honored State," to keep the negro in ignorance. I read his words:

"Mr. MASON. I say that it is the established policy, and has been probably for a century—I do not know how long a time—of my own State, and I think equally so of the State of Maryland, the adjoining State, and, so far as I am informed, of the legislation of all the slave States, to prohibit the education of the negro race, and in my judgment a wise policy, an expedient and a just one. I am not going into the reasons for the policy, for that does not become me here. But such is the policy; and in my opinion the proper and wise administration of the affairs of the District of Columbia requires our legislation here to conform to the policy of the adjoining States in reference to this population, bond or free."—Congressional Globe, Thirty-Sixth Congress, first session, p. 1080.

Now, Mr. President, let me draw the contrast. Where is that Senator from Virginia? An outcast in a foreign land. Where is that Senator from Mississippi? A rebel in his own land. We propose to elevate the freedmen to all the dignities and privileges of a citizen, and to make him the equal of other men in regard to political privileges. Verily, Mr. President, the balances of God are just and true, and they need no sealer of weights and measures to test the allotments of divine compensation and retribution.

Mr. President, I am not one of those who believe or assent to the declaration that this is the Government of the white man, and then offer it as an excuse for neglecting or ostracizing the black man; but I hold it to be the Government of all men, and for all men and all classes of men. It is its crowning glory that no citizen or person living under it is so high or so powerful that he can refuse or deny its obligation; and none so low that its protection cannot reach him. Its great strength is in the universality of its principles, and its chief danger in attempts to narrow, contract, crib, and confine their application.

Whence comes this idea, Mr. President, that this is the white man's Government? Its founders did not so make it. They laid its foundations upon the rights of man—not of white men, or black men, but all men; and it was the sad, the wretched mistake we made in denying the application of this principle to the black man which has devastated the land with civil war and deluged it in blood; and every battle-field, and every soldier's grave, and every wound, and every drop of blood shed, and every twinge of pain and anguish therefor and thereby, is but the declaration of Omnipotence that these men have rights which this Government must respect.

Mr. President, the question of the negro has troubled the nation long. His condition as a slave troubled you; and his condition as a freedman troubles you. Are you sick, heart-sick of this trouble? And do you inquire, when will it end? I will tell you. When you have given him equal rights, equal privileges, and equal security with other citizens; when you have opened the way for him to be a man. Then will you have rendered exact justice which can alone insure stability and content.

Sir, if I ever did hold that this Government was made or belonged exclusively to the white man, I should now be ashamed to avow it, or to claim for it so narrow an application. The black man has made too many sacrifices to preserve it, and endangered his life too often in its defense to be excluded from it. The common sentiment of gratitude should open its doors to him, if not political justice and equality.

Mr. President, my house once took fire in the night time; my two little boys were asleep in it, when I and their mother were away. The neighbors rushed into it, saved the children, and extinguished the flames. When I reached it, breathless and exhausted, the first exclamation was, "Your children are safe." Can you tell me how mean a man I should have been, and what execration I should have deserved, if the next time those neighbors came to my house I had kicked them out of it? Tell me then, I pray you, why two hundred thousand black men, most of whom volunteered to fight your battles, who rushed in to save the burning house of your Government, should not be permitted to participate in that Government which they helped to preserve? When you enlisted and mustered these men, when your Adjutant General went South and gathered them to the recruiting office, and persuaded them to join your ranks, did he, or any one, tell them this was the white man's Government? When they came to the rendezvous did you point to the sign over the door, "Black men wanted to defend the white man's Government?" When you put upon them the uniform of the United States did you say, "Don't disgrace it; this is the white man's Government?" When they toiled on the march, in the mud, the rain, and the snow, and when they fell out of the ranks from sheer weariness, did you cheer them on with the encouragement "that this is the white man's Government?"

When they stood on picket on the cold, stormy night to guard you against surprise, did you creep up and warm their congealing blood with an infusion of the white man's Government? When, with a wild hurrah, on the "double quick," they rushed upon the enemy's guns, and bore your flag where men fell fastest and war made its wildest havoc, where explosion after explosion sent their mangled bodies and severed limbs flying through the air, and they fell on glacis, ditch, and scarp and counterscarp, did you caution them against such bravery, and remind them that "this was the white man's Government?" And when the struggle was over, and many had fought "their last battle," and you gathered the dead for burial, did you exclaim, "Poor fools! how cheated! this is the white man's Government?" No, no, sir; you beckoned them on by the gerdon of freedom, the blessings of an equal and just Government, and a "good time coming."

And can you now deny it to them?

Do you say they have that freedom? Slavery is abolished. True; but what is that freedom worth which they have no means to maintain, and which depends upon the uncertain and undefined protection of another?

"White man's Government," do you say? Go to Fort Pillow; stand upon its ramparts and in its trenches, and recall the horrid butchery of the black man there because he had joined you against rebellion, and then say, if you will, "This is the white man's Government."

Go to Wagner. Follow in the track of the Massachusetts fifty-fourth, as they went to the terrible assault, with the guns flashing and roaring in the darkness. Mark how unflinchingly they received the pelting iron hail into their bosoms, and how they breasted the foe! See how nobly they supported, and how heroically they fell with their devoted leader; count the dead; pick up the severed limbs; number the wounds; measure the blood spilled; and remember why and wherefore and in whose cause the negro thus fought and suffered, and then say, if you can, "This is the white man's Government."

Go to Port Hudson, go to Richmond, go to Petersburg, go anywhere and everywhere, to every battle-field where the negro fought, where danger was greatest and death surest, and tell me, if you can, "that this is the white man's Government."

And then go to Salisbury and Columbia and Andersonville, and as you shudder at the ineffable miseries of those dens, and think of those who ran the dead-line, and were not shot, but escaped to the woods and were concealed and fed and piloted by the black men, and never once betrayed, but often enabled to escape and return to their friends; and then tell me if "this is a white man's Government."

Then, sir, follow one of these exchanged prisoners to his home. See how lovingly the mother clasps the emaciated form of her "darling soldier boy" in her arms; how carefully she feeds and nurses him, how gently she tends him, how constantly she watches over him, and as she bends her ear to hear him tell how the black man saved him, whisper in the other ear, "This is the white man's Government."

Ay, sir, go to the grave of one of these devoted black men, where they lie all along the march of your armies, and upon every battle-field and rampart, and, remembering there by what fiery trials and struggles this nation has been saved, think of him who sleeps beneath your feet, and how and why he died, and then give thanks to God that you are not like other men, especially this poor negro, and that the "white man's Government" has been preserved.

Oh, what a cruel mockery to say to such men, as did the Senator from Pennsylvania, that "a right to vote was but a chance to get their heads broke in contact with a superior race." When these men went forth to fight did that Senator think of broken heads, or is it a new solicitude, born only when they ask to be acknowledged as citizens of a common country to which they have devoted their lives?

Galileo, to borrow an illustration used by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] asserted, in spite of the Inquisition, "that the earth did move;" but, ah me! Mr. President, it seems sometimes to go backward.

In ancient Rome, when one not a citizen deserved well of the republic, he was rewarded by the rights of citizenship, but we deny them, and here in America—not in the confederate States of America, where, attempting to found a government upon slavery and the subjection of one race to another, it would have been fitting, if anywhere, but in the United States of America, the cardinal principle of whose Government is the equality of all men. After these black men have so nobly fought to maintain the one and overthrow the other, when they ask us for the necessary right of suffrage to protect themselves against the rebels they have fought, and with whom they are compelled to live, we coolly reply, "This is the white man's Government." Nay, more, and worse, we have refused it to them, and allowed it to their and our worst enemies, the rebels. Sir, from the dim and shadowy aisles of the past, there comes a cry of "Shame! shame!" and pagan Rome rebukes Christian America.

But not chiefly, Mr. President, do I advocate this right of the black man to vote because he has fought the battles of the Republic and helped to preserve the Union, but because he is a citizen and a man, one of the people, one of the governed, upon whose consent, if the Declaration of Independence is correct, the just powers of the Government rest; an intelligent being, of whom and for whom God will have an account of us, individually and as a nation; whose blood is one with ours, whose destinies are intermingled and run with ours, whose life takes hold on immortality with ours, and because this right is necessary to develop his manhood, elevate his race, and secure for it a better civilization and a more enlightened and purer Christianity.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] the other day asserted in this Chamber that if we conferred suffrage on the negro it was a boon—a gift from us to him—not something to which he had a right, but which we conceded or gave; and I understood the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] to assent to this idea. Sir, I dissent entirely—

Mr. WADE. What proposition does the Senator say I assented to?

Mr. CLARK. I will state it again, because I desired to call that Senator's attention to it, for I thought the expression was unguarded if he meant to make it. I say the honorable Senator from Nevada the other day asserted in this Chamber that if we granted the negroes the privilege of voting it would be a boon from us to them, a gift which we conferred, and not a right which belonged to them; and I understood the Senator from Ohio to assent to that position.

Mr. WADE. If I did, I did not understand it.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Globe will so show him, but I think he did not understand the proposition, and it is for that reason that I call his attention so particularly to it.

Mr. WADE. I entirely deny any such inference as being a sentiment of mine.

Mr. CLARK. So I supposed; for I think it would be in opposition to all his utterances and his whole life. The black man has just as much right to his vote as the white man has to his; and it is no more a gift or boon in the one case than in the other; and the white man has no more authority to confer or withhold it than the black man; and the black man of this city has just as good a right to vote that the white man shall not exercise the elective franchise here as the white man has that the black man shall not. Neither has the right to control or restrict the other; and the question comes to Congress to determine what is right, what is proper, and what is the best thing to be done.

I maintain that the black man has just as good a right to his life and liberty as the white man has to his; and that, if suffrage is necessary to protect that life and liberty, or for other purposes, it is just as much the right of the black man as it would be of the white man in similar circumstances. It is an individual right, to be regulated and limited for the good of the State; but these limitations should apply to all classes, and be clearly for the public good. It should never be needlessly violated or withheld. I do not assent, Mr. President, to a distinction sometimes made that suffrage is a privilege, in the sense of a thing permitted to be done, and not a right. I contend it is a right. If it is a privilege, who confers the privilege? The Government, it is answered. Whence does the Government derive the power to confer the privilege? Why, from the people surely—nowhere else. Then this is a statement of the case: the people confer on the Government the power or privilege to confer on the people the power or privilege of voting; which is as sensible as it would be for you to give me a dollar, which I had previously given you for that purpose, and call it charity.

Sir, government, according to the Declaration of Independence, derives its just powers from the consent of the governed. This implies that the governed may of right, not of privilege, give or withhold that assent. How do the governed do this? Why, by their votes, not otherwise, and thus the governed have the right to give or withhold their votes. It is their right, and not a privilege conferred.

Mr. WADE. God gave the right.

Mr. CLARK. I am stating the argument of some other people. Man derives the right from his manhood and the equality of his manhood with his fellow-man.

Does any one say, Mr. President, this is negro equality? So it is—political equality, not social. This last is not the creature of legislation, or political organization, but of taste, propriety, and fitness. In some of the States the negro has now, and has for a long time had, the same political rights as the white man. The law makes no distinction for or against him, but he is left to acquire that position in society to which his abilities and behavior entitle him.

And why should not this be so? Was not your Government founded upon that idea—the political equality of all men? Is he not entitled to his life as clearly and fully as the white man? That life may not be of the same consequence in the community as another life, but be it of more or less value, is not the negro just as much entitled to it as any other man can be to his? And has he not a right just as good to have it protected by law? So, too, of all those rights known as personal rights. Has he not as good a right to come and to go at his pleasure as the white man? Just as much right to own a portion of the soil and have a home as the white man? And if he settles by the side of another who does not quite relish his being there, has that other any more right to drive off and exclude the black man than the black man has to drive off and exclude the white man? Has he not the same right to defend his person and his property? Should not the tribunals of justice be equally open to him, and should he not be permitted to tell his story?

"Certainly, sir, certainly, this is all proper. We grant you the negro should have all these rights; but he has no right to vote."

Let us see. You admit the courts should be open to the black man, and that he should have the protection of the laws as fully as the white man. Why, then, should he not have a part, a vote, in determining the laws which are to be administered to him, or in the selection of the officers who are to administer them? Do you tell me he is too ignorant for such functions? I reply he is no more ignorant than many whites, and ignorance is no worse in a black man than in a white man, and if one is disqualified by it, so, then, is the other. And yet, sir, I have never found one of those persons who oppose negro suffrage upon the ground of ignorance willing to exclude the white man for the same reason. I would put both on the same basis, whether with or without restriction or qualification. If the negro should learn to read and write before he votes, let the white man do the same.

Again, sir, it has been said in a very respectable quarter, we "do not wish to make the grant of the elective franchise by the late insurgent States to their emancipated slaves a condition of their being allowed to resume their political relations in the Union, because—one reason—before we grant the right to vote to any new elements we require a certain probation—of natives twenty-one years age, of adult foreigners five years' residence—and we ought to require some similar probation of the ignorant mass of the late slaves." Very good, sir. But of rebels—what probation would these same gentlemen require of them? None; not a day. They should at once be restored to their former relations—allowed to vote and to be voted for, to hold office, receive salaries, sit with loyal legislators to neutralize and paralyze the necessary legislation, and to accomplish with the ballot what they failed to do with the bayonet. Would you like, sir, to run your ship of state on a rebel torpedo? Then keep clear of southern waters until you have fished them out, or are made certain none are there. Sir, I would rather have the vote of the loyal black man, who periled his life to save the country, without probation, than of the rebel white man who periled his to destroy it, even with probation. One may be ignorant, the other certainly has been wicked; the one might vote wrong by mistake, the other by design has aimed the most deadly blows at the existence of the Government.

Tell me, sir, if called upon to put arms into the hands of men in the disloyal States, into whose hands would you put them? Would you do as they have done, or attempted to do, in Mississippi—arm the rebel militia, and disarm the loyal black soldier?

Mr. WADE. Who has done that?

Mr. BROWN. The President did that.

Mr. CLARK. Gentlemen say the President did that. I was not commenting on the author; I was commenting upon the impolicy of the act.

Surely not, sir; you would retain the arms in the hands of the black men. Let, then, your ballots go where you would intrust your bayonets. Both are effective weapons; and if in time of war you needed the black man's bayonet to preserve your Government, you may equally, in time of peace, need his ballot to guard against acts more insidious but scarcely less pernicious than open rebellion. If the black man has intelligence enough to know on which side to fight, he certainly will know on which side to vote. And if amid the fire and smoke of rebellion he kept the old flag in sight, and prayed for it and fought for it, much more readily in time of peace will he discern and strive to preserve the great principles of constitutional liberty.

Mr. President, the restrictions which have been laid on the black man in many States are the outgrowth, the miserable brood and spawn of slavery, and they should perish with it.

The negro was denied land and home, because he was the chattel of his master; he was denied access to the courts, because he had no rights which a white man was bound to respect; he was not permitted to testify, because he might tell of the enormities practiced upon him; and he was denied a vote, that he might be of no sort of influence or consequence in human affairs. Sir, strike from him all these disabilities with his fetters, and give him the fullest opportunity, with all the necessary means, to elevate himself from his humble, despised condition. Does any one, I say again, complain that this leads to equality? Then let him go and complain of his Maker that He formed the negro at all; that He allowed him to breathe the same air, see the same light, hear the same sounds, or walk the same earth with the white man; that He gave him instincts, passions, hopes, desires, capabilities, a soul reaching to immortality; in short, that He made him a man! Here is the difficulty. The negro is a man! and however degraded, inferior, abject, or humble, it is our duty to elevate and improve him, and to give him the means of elevation or improvement; and the Senator from Kentucky may assert and prove that there are thirty-six, fifty-six, or a hundred and six points of difference between him and a white man, but until he shows he is not a man, the negro will be entitled to be treated by us as a man, and to demand and enjoy the same political privileges as other men.

Mr. President, open rebellion is ended and the Union is safe from its violence, but we are not through with our difficulties or dangers. Grave matters arising out of the war press themselves on our consideration and demand our resolute action. Among these stand foremost the protection of the freedmen, and the restoration of the rebellious States to their true relations with the Government. Both are of difficulty, but both of urgent necessity, and both are complicated, each with the other, by the fact, that the freedmen live in these rebellious States, and are to be protected there, while the people of these States are intensely hostile to them in many parts, and subject them to oppressive indignities, barbarous cruelties, stripes, and death.

All agree that the freedman must be protected. It has been said with equal beauty and force that "the poor man's life should never depend upon the rich man's pleasure." Nor should the freedman, whose shackles have been broken by the wrench and twist of war, be left to the indifference, neglect, control, or cruelty of his inexorable master. If that master has submitted to superior force, his submission will be coextensive only with that force; and whenever opportunity shall offer, having no longer any interest in him as a chattel, he will wreak his malignity and his vengeance upon the freedman, as both the object of his rebellion and the cause of his defeat. His master will sell him no land, that he may have no home. He will allow him no home, that he may become a vagrant. Becoming a vagrant, he will arrest him as a vagabond, and visit him with imprisonment or stripes, or both. He will give him no work, that he may starve or steal; and if he steal he will convict him of crime, sell him into servitude, and hold him again as a slave. He will shut him from the courts, seal his mouth as a witness, and beat, kidnap, or murder him, as passion may instigate or instinct prompt.

Now, how shall this man be protected, and protected where he is? For I hold it essential that these men should remain where they are, to labor and develop the resources of the South, and make it a richer and more prosperous country than ever before. The country which exports its labor commits suicide.

You may open the courts to him by law, you may make him a competent witness, you may give him land for a home, you may sweep away all distinction by law between him and others, and leave him at liberty to go and to come, to sue and be sued, to contract and labor when and where and how he pleases; you may establish for him schools and give him the means of information, and all these are necessary and well. You may go further; you may order him food and clothing, you may set over him the Freedmen's Bureau to guard his interests and redress his wrongs, you may continue this bureau from year to year, and still, in my judgment, you will have failed to do what most of all you need to do—put the black man in a position to protect himself. You will have done much toward it, you will have fitted him to use his weapon, but not have supplied him with the weapon. To do this fully you must give him the ballot, make him a part of the Government, and thereby encourage a feeling of independence and self-respect. There is nothing like the ballot for this. Take it from your northern men and they would feel powerless and degraded. Leave it in their hands and they are as good as the best, and can hurl Governors, members, and Senators from their seats of power. Arm three or four million of people with this weapon, and they will protect themselves and teach their oppressors caution and respect. Make them respect themselves, and they will soon command the respect of others.

I now turn, Mr. President, to the consideration of the other point, to wit, the restoration of the rebellious States. And here, if I mistake not, we shall find the extension of suffrage to the loyal blacks of the utmost importance, if not a sine qua non.

Men differ somewhat as to the condition of these States; and there are those who would restore them at once to the exercise and enjoyment of the privileges and powers of loyal States. Restore them, say they, first, and settle the points of difference between you, and the terms and conditions, afterward. But I am not one of those. Settle the terms and conditions first, and, above all, do what you may to fix the proper status and condition of the freedmen; for rely upon it you will find it vastly more difficult afterward, if not impossible. But, say they, will you delay restoring these States to their rights for that purpose? Sir, I do not deem these rebels can claim many rights. They spurned them when they left us, and they forfeited them when they rebelled. Can these rights be put on or put off, cast away, lost, and recovered, just as the rebels choose? Nay, sir, I hold rather with the Roman orator, that they have no rights in the Republic who have been false to it: "Attingam in hac urbe ii, qui a republica defecerunt, civium jura tenebunt."

Mr. President, I have often said I wished these States restored. I say it now. I do not wish, mean, or intend that one foot of territory or one particle of jurisdiction shall be lost to this Union. We fought to keep it, and we have won the fight, and I will not tear the flag which treason could not rend. Not only upon it let every star be blazoned, but let every star bear its old name and be in its old place; and let the memories of the better days of the Republic be woven with the golden hues of a more prosperous future, and form a veil which shall conceal forever the hideous features of civil war. But I do not hesitate to declare here in my place that I would not now vote to admit any one of these States to a participation in the administration of the Government unless, as said by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. LANE,] I might vote for the admission of the State of Tennessee. The State of Tennessee, in my judgment, stands upon a different foundation from any other rebel State, because before this rebellion was disarmed, when the rebels had them in their hands, she was enabled to form a government true to the Union, and she has preserved that government ever since. She is enabled to send us, I believe, men who can take the oath required of them as having ever been loyal men and having never directly or indirectly voluntarily aided the rebellion. But I do not believe that it would be safe to admit the other States; nor do I believe I shall ever vote at any time to admit to this floor men who have been actively engaged in this rebellion, in shooting, starving, and butchering our soldiers, or dismembering the Union, and seeking the life-blood of the nation. I shall stand by the oath which excludes such men from these seats. I shall subject the nation to no such danger; myself and associates to no such infamous companions. Traitors cannot thus be rewarded by any agency of mine. Treason cannot be thus honored. The President said "it must be made odious," and with that I agree. It may be pardoned, its punishment removed, and the rebels permitted to live under a Government which they have sought to destroy, but when this is done, there will still remain the damning fact, that they have been false to their country. Naught

"Can wash the guilty stain away."

They may be so again. Treason once committed is sufficient for all time, and there should be no space or opportunity for its repetition.

And, Mr. President, if I judge aright, the rebellion has been disarmed but not subdued. Much of its spirit, its malignity survives; and while those who have been engaged in it say they accept the situation, it is but too evident that had they now the strength they would throw off your authority and defy your power. Their lips acknowledge their allegiance to your Government, and they will keep it, because they have not strength to break it; but the heart is not warmed by any genuine loyalty. They allow the old flag to float because they dare not tear it down; but they will cheer a rebel song at the theater oftener and far more heartily, than the "Star-Spangled Banner." The Union man is despised and placed under the social ban. Treason is not made odious; but loyalty that never swerved, patriotism that never flinched is.

True, these men accept the situation, and ask you for offices, but they will fill them with rebels, and select those who have smitten your soldiers the oftenest and hardest. They will accept your salaries at Richmond, and plow up your dead at Cold Harbor.

The rebel States are not only full of such persons, but they are controlled by them, and whenever Senators are admitted here from those States, such men will be too often presented for admission.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] in discussing with his accustomed ability and force the position of these rebel States, and the policy of the President for restoring them to their true relations with the Government, very distinctly stated that he would not vote to admit to this Senate men whose hands were reeking with the blood of Union soldiers. Evidently he does not think it quite safe or prudent so to do. He does not think rebels should rule. Nor do I. The men who have sought to destroy the Government should not be intrusted with its safety. Now let me ask that Senator, if it is not safe to admit a rebel to sit and vote here, in what respect is it safe for him to sit and vote anywhere else in this nation, and what sort of a way is it to make a disloyal State loyal, to allow rebels to rule it? And yet we have this astounding palpable fact, that the administration of the government in almost every instance in those rebellious States has been suffered to go into the hands of rebels, and to fall under their control. Nay, more, while there were three or four millions of loyal people in those States, they have been carefully excluded from all participation in the reorganization of those States. White traitors have been preferred to them. And thus it is, sir; elections have been held by traitors, conventions and Legislatures have been held by traitors, offices filled, and a public sentiment created which to-day is more hostile in many places than it was months ago. Sir, our dangers are not yet passed, and we must see to it that we do not lose in legislative halls what our soldiers secured in the field.

Sir, I do not hold that these rebellious States are out of the Union. They went out neither by the back door of secession nor the side door of rebellion. They are still States in the Union; but they have been in rebellion and are still disloyal at heart; and while in that rebellion they overthrew and destroyed the loyal State governments. And after their military power was broken, it became necessary to reconstruct those governments and put them again in motion. On this idea and assumption the President proceeded. He first established provisional governments. I will not now inquire by what authority, for I suppose by military authority as Commander-in-Chief, but I will inquire why and wherefore did he do it. The answer is plain and ready. Because the old State governments were gone, destroyed by the rebels in being made the instruments of treason; and there were no loyal governments in those States, and new ones must be formed. But yet, into the hands of the very rebels who had destroyed the old he intrusted the formation of the new; carefully excluding from all participation a very large proportion of the loyal people of those States, by declaring that the qualification of voters should be the same as when these States went into rebellion. Now, this is the point I make: the rebellion had overthrown all laws about the qualifications of voters in these States; and so the President understood it, else why did he declare what they should be? And he set up the old qualifications which excluded a very large share of the loyal men. Sir, in my judgment he should have rather excluded the rebels and let the loyal people vote; and I should about as soon have undertaken to stop the yellow fever by sending round infected clothes, as Blackburn did, as to have checked rebellion by letting rebels vote.

Do you tell me that the qualifications of voters, the determining who should vote and who not, had been left to the States, and that they had excluded the black man from voting? Then I reply, their State governments and their qualifications had all been swept away together, and, there being no State government or organization, there could have been no State limitation or restriction. The President himself did not understand that there was any State law in force prescribing who should be voters, for he undertook himself to prescribe the rule, even to exclude some persons who had been admitted to vote under the old State laws; and if these old State laws did exclude loyal men from voting, he could just as well have determined by military authority who should vote as set up a provisional government by military authority.

Sir, I sustain and will labor to advance the President's policy of restoring to their true position at an early day these rebellious States, when it shall be safe so to do. But I must confess I do not admire this method, nor am I surprised at the results. I do not wonder Union men are defeated and rebels elected, nor that traitors bear themselves haughtily, and "dispitefully use" those who never flinched in their loyalty.

Mr. President, I have made these remarks, not to criticise the President's acts, nor to withhold or withdraw from him one grain of strength or support: but to make plain, if I can, the necessity of suffrage to every loyal person in these States to enable you to restore and hold them in their true relations. There is in all these States a large number of loyal people. In some sections they outnumber those who have been in rebellion. Most of them, it is true, have been slaves; they are ignorant, and perhaps as yet do not fully comprehend their condition. But they are loyal, and I would make their loyalty a counterpoise of treason, and secure the State against it by conferring on them the same civil and political rights which are enjoyed by other citizens of the same State.

There are, so far as I can see, but three ways to be taken with these rebellious States:

Either they must be intrusted to rebel hands; or they must be held by military power; or the loyal people must be admitted to control them.

The first method is entirely inadmissible; the second by no means desirable, except as a necessity; and the third is both practicable and desirable. I would no more admit the rebels to control these States than I would sail a ship with the mutinous part of a crew, and confine those who were faithful to the captain in the hold or put them in irons. Military rule is contrary to the very objects and aims of our Government, while suffrage to all men is but the practical application of its two cardinal principles, self-government and equality in that government.

I say the last method is practicable. Take, for instance, the State of Mississippi. In 1860 she had 350,901 white inhabitants and 437,404 colored. Now give these 437,404 men the ballot, and traitors never would be troubled with the "iron-clad oath," for they never would have a chance to take it. Would you let the negroes rule the State, do you ask? Yes, sir, in preference to rebels, for I am sure they will never carry it out of the Union, and will cause you no more blood and treasure in preserving it in its true relations.

Do you say this would be dangerous? Experience does not so teach. In many of these States negroes once voted, and no harm came of it. Down as late as 1828, in the State of Tennessee, they voted and elected a member of Congress. By every one who would exclude these colored men from voting should be remembered the words of Jefferson:

"With what excretion should the statesman be loaded, who, permitting one half the citizens thus to trample on the rights of the other, transforms those into despots and these into enemies; destroys the morals of one part and the patriotism of the other."

Mr. President, I have thus far but stated some of the general considerations which should govern us in our conclusions on this great question. I might follow out its details, and I think they would be found equally interesting and conclusive. I might notice, and I think successfully resist, the objections to it, and I might point out the means and method by which practically this grand result may be reached; but I must content myself by saying I will labor and toil for it in every practical way, and with earnest hope and faith that it will in time be reached.

Mr. President, if we are true, steadfast, earnest seekers of the right path, we shall find and pursue it. The difficulties which now surround us will vanish or be overcome; and as during these years of civil commotion and convulsions of the political elements, and the rockings of the very foundations of your Government, the dome of your Capitol has risen steadily and majestically upward, till it now stands finished in all its beautiful proportions, neither affected by the expansion of "summer's heat" or the contraction of "winter's cold," nor shaken by the tempest's gust, so shall your Government rise from the conflicting elements around it till, surmounted at last with a statue cut from the same precious stone on which its foundations rest—the equality of all men—it shall draw the admiring nations toward it, exclaiming, "How beautiful are thy tabernacles!"

Sir, if a stranger had come to yonder rotunda a month ago and turned his face upward to look on the eye of the dome, he would have seen nothing but a rough scaffolding of boards and timbers, and known nothing of the glories of art beyond. If that same stranger should come now and look into the same eye of the dome, he would find the rough scaffolding gone, and behold beyond in beautiful staccos the mystic dance of these United States surrounded by Agriculture and Manufactures, Commerce and the Arts. And so, sir, when shall be withdrawn the rough scaffolding of strife and discord, we shall again behold all these States restored and united. And there shall be no more war, but agriculture and manufactures, commerce and the arts, education and Christianity, not in picture, but in effulgent reality, shall shed a glory over them hitherto unequalled.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

Mr. HENDRICKS. With the consent of the Senator from Oregon, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 14, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

QUARANTINE AT NEW YORK.

Mr. DARLING. I ask unanimous consent at this time to consider a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to place at the disposal of the commissioners of quarantine at the port of New York such hulks and vessels as they have no use for. It is in anticipation of the cholera.

No objection was made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I send to the Clerk's table the joint resolution which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, with certain amendments, which the committee unanimously recommend, in the nature of a substitute.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy be, and they are hereby, respectively authorized in their discretion to place gratuitously at the disposal of the commissioners of quarantine, or the proper authorities, to be used by them temporarily for quarantine purposes, such vessels or hulks belonging to the United States as are not required for other use of the National Government, subject to such restrictions and regulations as the said Secretaries may respectively deem necessary to impose for the preservation thereof.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PETITION OF CITIZENS OF ALABAMA.

Mr. BOUTWELL, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of people of Alabama; which was referred to the committee on reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL BUREAU OF EDUCATION.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the convention of school superintendents lately held in this city, asking the establishment of a national Bureau of Education.

Mr. GARFIELD also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, which accompanied the above-mentioned memorial, to establish a national Bureau of Education; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, with the memorial, was referred, on motion of Mr. GARFIELD, to a select committee of seven, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BANKING LAW.

Mr. HOOVER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Currency and Banking be instructed to consider the expediency of amending the bankrupt act, so that interest-bearing legal-tender notes shall not be included as part of the lawful money required to be held by national banks for the redemption of their liabilities.

PENSION LAW.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill supplementary to an act to grant pensions, approved July 14, 1862; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. MILLER. I ask unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Whereas the Agricultural Reports have been so ably conducted, and the subject-matter therein contained deemed very valuable by the farming community and others, that the number of copies heretofore printed are inadequate to meet the increasing demand: Therefore,

Resolved, That three hundred thousand extra copies be, and are hereby, ordered to be printed for each of the years 1863, 1864, and 1865, (including the extra copies heretofore ordered,) the same to be for the use of the members of this House for distribution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I must certainly object to that resolution in any shape.

Mr. DAWES. I would like the permission of the gentleman from Illinois to make an inquiry in reference to this matter.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman has my permission.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to know if any response has been received to a resolution passed by the House with reference to the expenditures of the Agricultural Department?

Mr. MOULTON. I am opposed to the resolution as it now stands. It seems to me that it should be in the nature of an inquiry. I wish to say that some three weeks ago a resolution was submitted by me in reference to the condition of the Agricultural Bureau. No information has been received upon that subject, and I hope the resolution will not pass in the form it now is or until we receive that information.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to call attention to a defect in the resolution.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to the resolution.

TAX ON TOBACCO.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

*Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the law imposing a tax on tobacco, so as to graduate such tax with reference to the relative value of cigars, or other manufactured forms of the article, or to make the same an ad valorem tax, and thus to equalize and apportion the burden and the protection more equitably and justly; and that the committee report by bill or otherwise.*

ORGANIZATION OF THE PENSION OFFICE.

Mr. EGGLESTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend the several acts relating to the organization of the Pension Office; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the contested-election case from the State of Michigan.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would like to inquire of the Chair, if I allow this case to go over until after the morning hour, whether any business can arise during the morning hour that will take precedence of it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot definitely answer the inquiry of the gentleman, because during the morning hour the House may go into Committee of the Whole on some special order, in which case the election case would be superseded. If the morning hour is entirely occupied by its appropriate business, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] can call up that case. It being a privileged question, it can be called up by the gentleman at any time when the House is not engaged in the consideration of other business.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will let the case go over until after the morning hour, and take my risk of the House going into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is calling committees for reports of a general nature, commencing with the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

CLERKS FOR POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. ALLEY. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have authorized me to report a bill to increase the clerical force of the Post Office Department. The Senate have already passed a bill of the same character, which was referred to our committee. And in order to save time I ask that the Senate bill be considered in the House at this time instead of the bill of a similar character from our committee.

No objection being made, the House proceeded to the consideration of Senate bill No. 96, to authorize an increase of the clerical force of the Post Office Department.

The bill was read at length. It provides that the Postmaster General may appoint, in addition to the clerical force now employed in the Post Office Department, four clerks of the first class, seven clerks of the second class, fourteen clerks of the third class, and four clerks of the fourth class; the same to be paid until the 30th of June, 1866, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] will give the House some reasons for this large increase of the clerical force of the Post Office Department, and the corresponding increase of the expenditures of the Government.

Mr. ALLEY. I will state, for the information of this House, that this increase was recommended by the Post Office Department. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads went into a very thorough and full investigation of the subject; and they were unanimously of the opinion, after several conferences with the Department, that their request should be granted.

And for the further information of the House I will send to the Clerk's desk a communication to me from the Postmaster General, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, January 10, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith for your approval the draft of a bill authorizing an addition to the clerical force of this Department.

The great increase of clerical labor incident to the restoration of the postal service throughout the southern States, added to the largely increased postal business in the northern States, as shown by the recent annual report of the operations of this Department, has rendered the additional clerical force called for by this bill necessary to the prompt and satisfactory transaction of the business of this Department.

The number and classification of the additional clerkships required, have been carefully arranged by the heads of the respective bureaus, after consultation with each other, and with myself, and I am satisfied that a less number than those asked for in this bill would not be sufficient for the proper management of the business of the Department.

As the services of these additional clerks are greatly needed at this time, I trust that the bill may be acted upon with as little delay as practicable.

I shall be happy to make further explanations to your committee, if desired, either by letter or in person, as may be most agreeable.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. DENNISON,
Postmaster General.

Hon. JOHN B. ALLEY, Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, House of Representatives.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not like to be captious in matters of this kind. Yet, on the other hand, I do not like to see appropriation bills considered out of Committee of the Whole. If I understand this bill aright, there is an appropriation in it.

The SPEAKER. There is,

Mr. STEVENS. Then I shall be obliged to ask that the rule be enforced, and ask that this bill be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Was not the bill read merely for information?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] asked to have the bill considered by the House at this time, and no objection was made.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the objection of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and his point of order come too late.

Mr. ALLEY. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will give me his attention for a moment—

Mr. STEVENS. I think that is a pretty sharp point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who appears to object to the ruling of the Chair, that it was made under the same rule under which the gentleman himself has at different times reported appropriation bills, which have not been read at the Clerk's desk, and in regard to which he has claimed that the point of order could not subsequently be made. The gentleman knows that very well, because he has often insisted upon that ruling himself. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] asked that the bill be considered in the House, and at this time. The Chair repeated the request audibly to the House, and there was no objection made.

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I will state for the information of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and of the House, that I was aware that this bill contains an appropriation; but there is in this case a distinction without a difference. The Senate bill provides that the appropriation shall come from the Treasury Department instead of from the Post Office Department, as provided in the bill reported by the committee. That is all the difference. Under the rules of the House, I would have the right to report the bill from the committee, and have it considered and passed upon now; while in the other case it required the consent of the House. Certainly, it can make no possible difference to the Treasury, to the Government, or to the Post Office Department; while, as this bill had passed the Senate, the adoption of it by the House would avoid the necessity of sending it back to the Senate for concurrence. Supposing that the slight variation of this bill from the House bill could make no difference to anybody, I stated to the House the facts in the case, asking the consideration of the bill at the present time. The Speaker stated that request, and no objection was made.

If the bill contained an appropriation such as made any difference in point of fact, I should not object to a reference to the Committee of the Whole. But, as everybody knows, a reference to the Committee of the Whole would substantially kill the bill; and as I deem this bill one of consequence, I of course object to that reference. The passage of the bill has been asked for by the Post Office Department; and the subject has been thoroughly investigated by the committee. Several members of the committee, including myself, have had conferences, not only with the Postmaster General, but with several of the heads of the bureaus; and those officers of the Department all concur in the opinion that the passage of this bill is imperatively demanded. They convinced the whole committee of the propriety of the measure, and we have reported the bill unanimously.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, as well as the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] has served with me in this House long enough to know that no member here is more careful than I am about such measures as this. Besides, Mr. Speaker, I think I can say with justice, and those who know the Postmaster General will doubtless concur with me in opinion, that that gentleman is as careful a public officer in reference to these pecuniary matters as any officer we have ever had at the head of any Department. The Postmaster General says that the wants of the Department imperatively require this additional force.

Now, sir, let me say to the House that the additional force asked for is not so large as it appears to be, because the Department has for several months past employed under the name of laborers something like half the force asked for, these employés being paid as laborers out of the contingent fund. As this additional force is so imperatively demanded, and as the matter has been thoroughly investigated, I hope the House will not refuse to pass this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if no further explanation is desired, I will call the previous question.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will permit us to consider this bill in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROSS. I desire to inquire what number of clerks the bill provides for, and what additional expense will be incurred by their employment.

Mr. ALLEY. The number that will be actually put in service, in addition to those already employed in the manner I have stated, will be something like sixteen; and the additional expense will be perhaps twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Will the gentleman accept an amendment that the appointees of this Department shall be apportioned among the several congressional districts of the United States as nearly as practicable?

Mr. ALLEY. I could not accept such an amendment as that.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I think that is fair. I shall vote against the bill unless such a principle be introduced into it, or be enforced by that Department.

Mr. ALLEY. I think that my friend from Illinois, if he will consider a moment, will not persist in asking for the adoption of such an amendment. He certainly cannot be in earnest, as there are not positions enough to allow one to each congressional district; and certainly he would not be in favor of turning out the officers now employed in that Department and substituting to such an extent new and inexperienced persons. Certainly such an amendment, as every one will see, is utterly impracticable.

I now call the previous question.

On seconding the call for the previous question the House was divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 18; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. ALLEY, and HARDING of Illinois.

The House was again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes eighty-four, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, moved that the bill be laid upon the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. KUYKENDALL demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEW YORK POST OFFICE.

Mr. ALLEY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a joint resolution relative to the courts and post office of New York city; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read at length.

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I will state for the information of the House that the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] introduced a bill which was referred to our committee, providing for the purchase of a site, and the erection of a new post office in the city of New York. The committee, on inquiry, learned that a new post office, in the judgment of everybody whose attention had been called to the subject, was required. The committee did not feel authorized to report back the bill as referred to them, but concluded, on consultation with the Departments and some eminent citizens of New York, to report this joint resolution, which provides for the appointment of a commission to select a site and report the price to the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Interior. We combine the two things. We thought, on consultation and examination of the subject, that the two could be combined very economically—the two propositions for the erection of a building for a post office and also for the accommodation of the United States courts in New York city. On the unanimous consent of all concerned it was concluded to put it in this form.

This commission is only authorized to report to the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Interior. Then, in their judgment, if the price is right, and the site such as they can recommend, they are authorized and directed to report to Congress. Certainly this preliminary action cannot be objected to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. What provision is made for the payment of this commission?

Mr. ALLEY. They are United States officers, with the exception of two individuals, one of whom is mayor of New York city. Nothing is said about pay.

Mr. DARLING. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, the gentlemen named in the joint resolution are but too happy to serve without compensation.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not know that there is any objection to the resolution, as Congress is not committed in any way, and the matter has to come back here.

Mr. CHANLER. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to state that this has been required by citizens of New York city—that they ask for the removal of the present site.

Mr. ALLEY. No, sir, I did not say that. The gentleman has misapprehended me. This is merely a commission to inquire into the matter. We found great difference of opinion. I would say, so far as the present edifice is concerned, that the majority were in favor of the present site if it can be adopted with propriety and will furnish the requisite accommodations.

Mr. CHANLER. I will ask one more question. The present New York post office is in what was an old church. I do not oppose the construction of a new building; but I would call the gentleman's attention to the fact that a commission to select a site for a new post office in New York is entirely distinct from the question of erecting proper accommodations for a post office. The present location is central, and there could not possibly be selected one more advantageous to the whole community. They have stations scattered through the city, and a central office is all that is required for the reception and distribution of letters. I hope the gentleman will so far modify his commission as to limit them in their action on this subject. A site was chosen and purchased under Mr. Buchanan's administration, if I am not mistaken. It cost the Government, I think, about seventy thousand dollars. The same property to-day would bring a great deal more. It is impossible at the present price of land in the city of New York for the Government to procure any place equal in availability at anything like that price; and I would suggest that the proposition looks more like a scheme for going in to buy lands than one to arrange for the site of a new post office. I believe economy is in favor of the present site.

Mr. ALLEY. I must say to the gentleman from New York that what he says now seems to me entirely irrelevant to the question under consideration.

Mr. CHANLER. I beg pardon, I did not mean to be irrelevant. I only wished to draw attention to the fact that the question should be divided.

Mr. ALLEY. If the gentleman will hear me for a moment I think he will be convinced that his remarks are entirely unnecessary. A great difference of opinion existed in regard to the site. It was with reference to that difference more than anything else, perhaps, that it was finally agreed upon unanimously that this commission should be appointed, and it is the understanding most distinctly of all the parties in interest who have been conferred with, that that question is not to be prejudged at all, but is to be open to the fullest and amplest consideration, examination, and investigation with regard to all the sites proposed. I think as the question now stands, so far as those are concerned who have been consulted, that the majority of opinion and feeling is that the present site is the best and most economical that could be selected; and it is not by any means certain, if a new building is erected, that it will not be erected on the present site.

Mr. CHANLER. I would ask the gentleman's permission one moment to state that it is exactly on that point that I was speaking. If you have the best site why not leave the best alone? You cannot do better than the best. If a commission is to be appointed for the erection of a proper building or proper accommodations for the post office, why go and look for another site when you have a most appropriate one, on a most valuable piece of land, in the very heart of the commercial center of the city? I certainly think that suggestion is relevant.

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] which is pertinent to the general subject of proper accommodations for Government officials and the convenience of the business community. We have in Philadelphia what is known as the Pennsylvania Bank building, which cost the Government of the United States a large sum of money, having been purchased some years ago for one of its Departments. In that city we have no accommodations belonging to the Government for the United States appraisers. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he would not be willing to incorporate in his resolution a request that the commission named by him should confer with the Postmaster General and Secretary of the Treasury, if necessary, in regard to the expediency of fitting up the Pennsylvania Bank building for the appraisers' department, and also of improving and enlarging it for the reception of bonded goods, so as to save the large expense of renting private warehouses for this purpose?

Mr. ALLEY. In reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL,] I will say that that matter did not come before the committee in connection with this subject; and as the mouth-piece of that committee, I should hardly be warranted in traveling out of the record so far as to comply with that request.

Mr. O'NEILL. One word further. I cannot see why there should be any difficulty in the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads including this proposition in the one submitted by its chairman. Now, I simply suggest that this is the very opportunity to bring up a question in which I may here say the merchants of Philadelphia are deeply interested, especially where the Government itself would be largely benefited by taking the building at the price set upon it by the Post Office Department. It comes in here, in my opinion, most pertinently as a matter about which this commission could inquire, the disposition of the building being still to a great extent under the control of the Post Office Department.

Mr. DARLING. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. ALLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DARLING. Mr. Speaker, I take issue with my colleague [Mr. CHANLER] in regard to the location of the post office in our city. I do not think that it would be necessary to spend a large sum of money, if any, for a new site, provided it be an eligible one. I think the city of New York, with its accustomed liberality, would be willing to donate to the United States Government sufficient land for the erection of a post office which would be a credit to the Government and commensurate with its importance and with the accommodations requisite for the convenience of the people, embracing, also, accommodations for the United States courts. The present locality, it is well known, is contracted, illy ventilated, dark, and very difficult of approach. It is true the Government has paid a large sum of money there, but the land would sell at any time for more than you have paid for it. It is also true that private contributions were appealed to for the purpose of securing that site.

Mr. ALLEY. I must remind the gentleman that that has nothing to do with the proposition now before the House.

Mr. DARLING. I merely wish to say further, in reply to my colleague, that the present site is not, in my judgment, such as is calculated for the accommodation of the post office in the great city of New York, whose people have to fall into line like voters at a voting precinct, and stand up to their ankles in mud and water before they can be served with their letters. I think it a disgrace to the nation that we should have such a place for the post office in the city of New York as exists there to-day.

Mr. ALLEY. I will now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POSTAGE STAMPS AND STAMPED ENVELOPES.

Mr. ALLEY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill relative to the sale of postage stamps and envelopes on credit; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ALLEY. This bill has passed the Senate precisely in the form in which I now report it, as Senate bill No. 71, which is now upon the Speaker's table. I propose to substitute that bill for the bill reported by the committee.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think we had better consider the House bill first and see what it is.

Mr. ALLEY. It is precisely the same bill word for word, and there is no appropriation in it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think we had better hold back the Senate bill for a little while until we see what this bill is.

Mr. ALLEY. Do I understand the gentleman to object to taking up the Senate bill?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think I am opposed to this whole measure, and if so, I would not desire to give the gentleman the advantage of getting up the Senate bill. That is frankly my reason.

Mr. ALLEY. Then I call for the reading of the bill I have reported.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Postmaster General, up to June 30, 1868, whenever, in his opinion, the public service shall require it, to deposit postage stamps and stamped envelopes with such persons as he may select for sale. It provides, further, that the person with whom the postage stamps and stamped envelopes are so left shall engage to sell and circulate the same under the instructions of the Postmaster General, and shall give bonds for the faithful keeping of such stamps and stamped envelopes, and for payment to the Postmaster General of the moneys received for the sale thereof.

The bill further provides that the Postmaster General may allow to such depositaries a commission not exceeding five per cent. on all such sales of stamps and stamped envelopes, the accounts of the parties to be audited and settled by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department, such parties to be deemed receivers and custodians of the public money, and be subject to all the pains and penalties, fines and forfeitures now provided by law in the case of receivers and custodians of the public money.

Mr. ALLEY. This bill was originally reported to the Senate by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of that body. It was recommitteed to that committee and subsequently reported back in a little different shape, precisely in the same form in which we have it now. It underwent a very rigid discussion in the Senate. The opposition was very marked and determined to the passage of the first bill, but afterward, when it was presented to the Senate in its present form, it received, after a thorough and full discussion, I think almost a unanimous vote. I am not quite certain, because the yeas and nays were not called. It comes to us in this form.

I will send now to the Clerk's desk, to be read, a letter from the Postmaster General, stating the reason why he desires the passage of this bill.

The Clerk read, as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, D. C., January 11, 1866.

SIR: I inclose a draft of a law authorizing the Postmaster General to sell stamps on credit.

The object of the law is to enable the Department to circulate its stamps through the States lately in rebellion.

This cannot now be done to any considerable extent for the reason that the law only authorizes the sale of stamps to postmasters or for cash.

There are many places in the southern States where there are neither persons who can take the oath required by law for the qualification of postmasters, nor persons of sufficient means to enable them to purchase stamps for cash.

I am advised that the demand for stamps is so great in those States that there may be found many persons of responsibility and integrity who, though unable to take the test oath, are able to give good bonds, and would cheerfully become responsible for the stamps intrusted to them, and sell them for the accommodation of the community where they reside.

It is my intention to appoint, so far as practicable, as receivers and venders of stamps persons who have already been appointed assessors, collectors, &c., and have therefore received the indorsement of the Government.

The compensation proposed is very light, but the penalties provided for are as severe as are now provided by law in all cases of receivers and custodians of public funds.

It is believed that a measure of the character proposed will not only produce considerable revenue to the Department, but will tend to promote a feeling of contentment and subordination among the people of the southern States, and at the same time protect the Department against loss.

Very respectfully, &c.,

W. DENNISON,

Postmaster General.

Hon. JAMES DIXON, Chairman Committee on Post Office and Post Roads, United States Senate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ALLEY. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I notice that it is stated in the letter which has just been read that the assistant assessors and collectors in the southern States are persons who have already "received the indorsement of the Government." I wish the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to state to this House in what manner these officers have received that indorsement, and whether those persons have taken the oath required by law; whether they have not, instead of that, sent on oaths, now filed in the Departments, that are unknown to the law; and whether, in at least one case, the officer has not omitted in his oath to state that he will support the Constitution of the United States.

It occurs to me that this bill is another departure from the general policy of the Government for the benefit of those who have been in rebellion against the Government, and I think it is time that this House should stop these departures. They have been made heretofore without the sanction of Congress, and it does seem to me that this is not the time for us to indorse, by this or any similar bill, these departures from the obligations imposed by the law upon the heads of our Departments, those departures being for the benefit of those who have been in rebellion against the Government.

Let this subject be considered fully in all its bearings before we attempt in this exceptional way to relieve all those persons who have been engaged in rebellion from the obligations which rest upon them equally with men who have been true to this Government throughout all the late struggle. I am opposed to special legislation for the benefit of rebels. Laws good enough for loyal men are good enough for those who are not loyal. I should like to have some explanation from the gentleman as to the character of the qualifications possessed by these officers, who are, in that letter, stated to "have received the indorsement of the Government."

Mr. ALLEY. I have no information in regard to these officers that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] or any other member of this House does not possess. I can only say that this bill does not provide, neither is it designed, that any of these officers shall be the custodians of these stamps unless they have the qualifications required by the laws of the United States.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] that the letter which has been read does state that these officers may be selected.

Mr. ALLEY. I will state to the gentleman that this letter was read in the Senate and has been published in the Globe, from which I have had it read. The original letter was sent to the chairman of the Post Office Committee of the Senate [Mr. DIXON] and was there read, at the time the bill was first reported. The same objection was made there, and the same discussion arose. The bill was then recommitteed and finally reported back in an amended form, and after a very thorough and searching investigation and a full discussion of the whole question, the bill was passed, as I stated before, by the Senate unanimously. I know that the bill received the support by word and vote of some of the most radical members of that body, as being a measure not in favor of the rebels, but one imperatively demanded by the public interest.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] allow me a word upon this bill?

Mr. ALLEY. If I yield to all who desire to say anything upon this bill, my time will be all taken up, and the gentleman must excuse me now.

Mr. STEVENS. I think this bill ought to be printed. We ought not to act upon such a bill as this in this way in the dark.

Mr. KASSON. I desire but a moment's time.

Mr. ALLEY. I will yield in a moment. I desire to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] Of course I have no desire whatever to suppress information, and I am willing to give the House every opportunity to investigate this subject most fully. But this is a matter which has been before the Senate for some time, and was thoroughly discussed there, and the discussions have been published in the Globe, and I supposed that almost every member of this House had had his attention drawn to this subject and knew something about it. But if it is the case that the House is not well informed upon this subject, then I am quite willing, of course, that it should go over, and be printed. But, under the circumstances, I think I must insist upon its consideration now.

I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] for five minutes.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill is, in my judgment, purely a business bill, concerning the proper and profitable conduct of the business of the Post Office Department. While I am opposed to one or two of the provisions of the bill, I cannot see the necessity for lugging in a question of reconstruction in connection with this simple bill.

The Post Office Department, in order to maintain the revenues of the Department, wants to sell all the stamps it can. This bill proposes a measure to facilitate the selling of stamps. They cannot be sold where they cannot be bought. My objection, therefore, to this bill does not rest upon the fact that it enables people in the South to buy the stamps which, under the laws of the United States, they must buy, or write no letters. My objection is that the bill contemplates what, it seems to me, is an interference with the system of administration adopted in recent acts touching the Post Office Department. Postmasters were formerly paid by commissions, dependent upon the number of postage stamps canceled; and they were charged and are now charged with the selling of stamps and stamped envelopes to anybody who may wish to buy them. It costs the Government nothing when it uses its own legitimate officers as the instrumentalities for the sale of these stamps and stamped envelopes. The proposition embraced in this bill is to allow five per cent. for the sale of these stamps to every one who shall be declared a depository. Considerably over ten million dollars' worth of stamps per annum are now sold; and an allowance of five per cent. would amount to half a million dollars annually.

I think that we should not subject the revenues of the Post Office Department to so serious a subtraction as is proposed by this bill. On the contrary, if there are not a sufficient number of postmasters in any localities to distribute stamps, I think it should be provided that the Department may in such cases deposit stamps for sale with any Government officer there, requiring that officer to attend to this business in connection with his other public duties, without any additional cost to the Government.

I am therefore opposed to this bill, as calculated to cause a serious reduction of the revenues of the Department. I think that the object sought can be much better accomplished by an amended bill. Hence I hope that an opportunity will be given for members to see the bill in print, so that we may propose such amendments as will arrive most effectually at the result desired.

I ought to add that I know full well, as does every gentleman who is acquainted with the Postmaster General, that no measure for the benefit or advantage merely of rebel interests will emanate from that Department. This bill involves a simple question of business. The Postmaster General is, beyond doubt, honest in his desire to facilitate the sale of stamps and increase the revenues of the Department. I do not like, however, the method in which he proposes to accomplish his object; and I hope an opportunity will be afforded to amend the bill.

Mr. BANKS. I hope that my colleague will allow me to say a word. I will not occupy more than one minute.

Mr. ALLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, the facilities of the post office rank among the highest privileges enjoyed by the people of this country. There is nothing so important to the people short of the protective power of the judiciary. Now, as I understand, this bill proposes to give to the States that are not in amicable relations with this Government the privileges of the post office, and to give them these privileges on credit, an advantage which no other part of this country enjoys. My opinion is that this privilege ought not to be given to those States, at least until they have settled their political affairs in a manner satisfactory to us.

Mr. ALLEY. My colleague will allow me to correct him by saying that this bill does not provide that any stamps shall be sold on credit. The bill first offered in the Senate did allow them to be sold in that way, but this does not.

Mr. BANKS. I certainly obtained that idea from the reading of the bill. This question, I submit, ought not to be decided upon a debate which has taken place elsewhere. It ought to be decided upon debate here, with the proposition in print before us, so that we can understand it. And let me say to my colleague that, in my view, there is no question before this Congress more important than the principle involved in this bill.

Mr. ALLEY. The gentleman from Iowa says he is opposed to the bill in its present shape; that he would have a bill which should require these stamps to be placed in the hands of United States officers, and in the hands of none others. Did I understand him correctly?

Mr. KASSON. Not quite. I suggested some such thing, not having examined the bill; but some such mode which would not be attended with such serious reduction of the revenue of the Government.

Mr. ALLEY. His objection is that it takes from the Treasury half a million dollars.

Mr. KASSON. Over that.

Mr. ALLEY. More than half a million dollars if this provision is carried out! I think the gentleman is entirely incorrect in his judgment. I think the cost to the Government will be trifling indeed, and the revenues will be much increased by the adoption of this bill. A great many stamps will then be sold that are not now sold. The Government will lose five per cent., or rather it will have to pay, for the sale of the stamps, five per cent., but it will gain ninety-five per cent. on every stamp sold. The sale of the stamps in this manner will be so restricted in quantity that in my opinion the amount which will be paid out in commissions in this way will not reach the sum of $20,000, instead of $500,000, as the gentleman suggests. I think, therefore, so far as that objection goes, it has to my mind little force.

In regard to depositing these stamps in the hands of United States officers, I am opposed to that very thing, and there consists the real difficulty. I think that United States officers should not receive these stamps for sale unless they are of that description of officers which the Postmaster General has been careful thus far to appoint, men who can subscribe to the oath which the laws of the United States require. If the gentleman from Iowa wishes to have these stamps placed in the hands of those who are acting as United States officers, by whomsoever appointed, who are unable to take the oath which the laws of the United States prescribe, I am persuaded it would be unsafe.

Mr. KASSON. Let me say, right here, that I am opposed to requiring the oath from any such men. I am for shopkeepers or others being allowed to sell them as any other merchandise, without requiring them to take an oath, letting them have them at par and selling them at par.

Mr. ALLEY. The gentleman from Iowa knows that officers of the United States are required to take an oath. He knows that some have not taken the oath. They were appointed under what were believed to be the necessities of the case, which, in my judgment, have never existed. Such officers have been appointed; and for one, if left to me, I should be opposed to placing these stamps in their hands. I am willing to grant this privilege to the Union men of the South, and everybody else, if thereby it develops the resources of the country and increases the revenues of the Government, and does no possible harm, as in this case I do not think it would, to any interest or just cause. I defy any gentleman upon this floor to show that the Government, or any individual, is harmed in the slightest degree by this provision. To be sure it will accommodate and benefit the people of the South of all classes.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Let me ask my colleague a question. Why has not a postmaster been appointed in every village, town, and city of the South?

Mr. ALLEY. The reason is because the Postmaster General is so particular, and justly so, that he will not allow any man to serve in that Department who does not subscribe to the oath prescribed by the laws of the United States.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Does the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inform the House that there is not at least one loyal man in each post office district of the South?

Mr. ALLEY. I mean to say there is not—or at least the Postmaster General has not found them. The Postmaster General has been only able to find something like two thousand, only one fourth of the whole, who could take the oath which the laws prescribe.

Mr. STEVENS. Why are we to have post offices in such places? Why not withhold them until we can find men to fill them?

Mr. SPALDING. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. ALLEY. I move that the bill be printed, as we will not have time to vote on it to-day, so that it may be upon members' desks to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FINCK. I ask my colleague on the committee to yield to me.

Mr. ALLEY. Certainly.

Mr. FINCK. I am unable, sir, to comprehend this determined opposition to this bill. What is it now pending before the House? A simple proposition to authorize the Postmaster General to appoint agents, wherever he may think the public interest requires it, for the purpose of disposing of postage stamps of the United States; and now gentlemen propose that the citizens of southern States shall not be appointed unless they can take the oath prescribed by Congress in July, 1862. It is a fact, sir, known to gentlemen on this floor, that the Post Office Department has been unable to obtain postmasters in the southern States, or contractors for carrying the mails, in order to afford all the necessary mail facilities required in those States.

We are told by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that the people ought not to have the facilities of the Post Office Department if they are unable to take this oath. And another distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts tells us substantially the same thing. Sir, I say that the continuance of this oath is most unwise and unjust. Why, sir, this is a mere bill for the purpose of carrying out the business of one of the Departments of the Government. It is true that one of the objects of the bill is to allow the appointment of men who cannot take the oath of 1862, but it is a necessity, an absolute necessity, in order to carry on the business of this branch of the Government that such a bill should be passed, or that the test oath of 1862 be swept from the statute-book. Sir, I believe we should afford all the necessary mail facilities to the people of the southern States. I believe such a course will create a better feeling between the two sections, and tend to harmonize the country.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having expired, the bill goes over till to-morrow, and the House resumes the contested-election case in the State of Michigan.

MICHIGAN CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the contested-election case of Baldwin vs. Trowbridge of the fifth congressional district of the State of Michigan.

The majority of the Committee of Elections reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That Rowland E. Trowbridge is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Ninth Congress from the fifth congressional district in Michigan.

The pending question was upon the following resolutions, moved by Mr. MARSHALL on the part of the minority of the Committee of Elections, as a substitute for the resolution of the majority:

Resolved, That Hon. Rowland E. Trowbridge is not entitled to hold the seat now occupied by him in this House as Representative from the State of Michigan.

Resolved, That Augustus C. Baldwin has been duly elected as a Representative from the State of Michigan to the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and is entitled to a seat in this House.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE was entitled to the floor.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, to have an opportunity to reply specifically and distinctly to the argument which might be submitted by the contestant in this case in this House against my right to represent the people of the fifth congressional district of Michigan in the Thirty-Ninth Congress of the United States. I have consented several times to the postponement of the consideration of this subject by the contestant on one pretext or another, and now, in order to get a consideration at the present time, I have consented to the printing of an argument which has not been made in this House by him. I am, therefore, driven to my recollections in regard to the argument made before the Committee of Elections, and to this little pamphlet which he caused to be laid on our tables in the early days of the session, in order to ascertain what reasons he urges against that right. I shall therefore submit to this House, briefly as I may, the reasons why I claim to be possessed of that right, hoping that my line of argument may meet the positions which he may have assumed in the speech which he has not made.

Mr. Speaker, the right to participate in the selection of those who are to enact and administer the laws by which the country is to be governed is justly considered, under a republican form of government, one of the most sacred and invaluable rights of the people. And as each House is made "the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," the people look with jealous anxiety to this House to guard this right against all abuse or encroachment. There is no other tribunal before which this question can be brought. Whatever other questions may be taken to the courts for adjudication, this one of the election, return, and qualifications of a legislator, can obtain no hearing there. There is no appeal from the decision which shall here be made. And while the people demand that no person who does not possess the requisite and prescribed qualifications of an elector shall be allowed to exercise that high privilege, with equal pertinacity do they insist that all who do possess those qualifications shall be secured an opportunity to make themselves felt in the councils of the nation.

The present case comes here on an agreed state of facts which are substantially as follows, namely:

The total number of votes cast for member of the Thirty-Ninth Congress for the fifth congressional district of Michigan, as returned to the State board of canvassers, was 24,599, of which number I received 12,647, and the honorable gentleman who contests my right to this seat received 11,937; thus showing a clear majority in my favor of 710 votes.

But it is claimed by the contestant that of this total number of votes 1,538 should not have been counted by the board of canvassers; and that of these 1,538 votes, 1,179 were polled for me, and 344 for him, showing that my majority of these 1,538 votes was greater than my majority of the total vote as before mentioned; and therefore that if these votes had not been counted by the board of canvassers there would have been a majority in his favor of 125 votes. The whole question then turns upon this point, namely, whether these 1,538 votes are to be counted and allowed in arriving at the result. If they are counted there is no question as to my right to represent the people of that district in this House. If on the other hand they are not counted, then there is no question but that the seat belongs to him.

Wherein, then, do these 1,538 votes differ from the other votes which were counted and allowed by the board without challenge?

At the time of that election, and for long previous, war had prevailed in the land, and the Government had been obliged to call upon its brave and loyal citizens to go forth and do battle for the life of the Republic. These citizens, thus called from their peaceful homes and converted into armed warriors in defense of their Government, were most of them qualified electors in the various States from which they came.

The Legislature of Michigan, like the Legislatures of many of the other States, knowing that it was impossible for these electors to be present at the usual ordinary places of voting within the State, and feeling that this exhibition of the highest duty of citizenship should not deprive them of the opportunity to exercise this most sacred right of citizenship, had provided by law that the ballot-box should be carried to them and their votes received at designated places other than those where the great mass of our people would exercise that privilege. These 1,538 votes which give rise to this contest were cast by qualified electors belonging to the fifth congressional district of Michigan, pursuant to and in accordance with the provisions of that law. This is the only difference between them and the other votes which were counted and allowed without challenge—they were cast at a different place.

The contestant denies the power of the Legislature to pass the law by which these citizen soldiers were allowed to vote, because he alleges that the constitution of that State fixes the places where the elections must be held, and being fixed in the fundamental law of the State he denies the power of the Legislature to fix any other. The language of the constitution which he claims accomplishes this purpose is to be found in section one of article seven of the constitution of that State, and is in these words, to wit:

"But no citizen or inhabitant shall be an elector or entitled to vote at any election unless he shall be above the age of twenty-one years, and has resided in the State three months and in the township or ward in which he offers to vote ten days next preceding such election."

He claims that the clause of this sentence, "has resided in the township or ward in which he offers to vote," fixes the place where the vote must be cast; that to "offer to vote" requires the personal presence of the voter at the place thus designated. There is no other point made against the law. It is not a question of residence, which is an element of qualification in the voter, for by another provision of the constitution of that State, namely, the fifth section of the same article seven—

"No elector shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of being employed in the service of the United States or of this State."

This settles the question of residence in regard to these men. They were "employed in the service of the United States," and wherever they resided when they entered that service there they continued to reside until, coming out of the service, they established some other residence, or at least abandoned the one previously acquired.

The honorable gentleman brings, in support of his position that the constitution of Michigan fixes the place where the elections must be held, and thus restrains the Legislature from fixing any other, a decision of the supreme court of that State, wherein it was held that certain county officers in that State could not hold offices to which they were elected by the soldiers' vote; and he claims that that decision decides this case, and ought to control this House. I hold that it does no such thing, and that if it did it ought not to control this House, because this House is expressly made by the Constitution the sole judge of the "elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members."

Let us examine and see what that decision is, and to whom it applies. It is conceded by the judges who made that decision, that the passage of such a law was undoubtedly an exercise of an ordinary legislative power, and clearly within the province of the Legislature, unless it was restrained or prevented by some controlling power. Judge Cooley, one of those judges, in his opinion in this case, says:

"I have no hesitation in holding that when the time, place, and manner of holding elections are not prescribed in the constitution, they are within the discretion of the Legislature, and the reception of votes from persons actually out of the election district, or even of the State, may be allowed by statute."

Judge Campbell, another of those judges, also in this case says:

"It is conceded that the power of regulating the times and manner of elections, and the places where they may be held, is one which is legislative in its nature, and belongs to that body which is intrusted with the general legislative authority, unless the constitution has limited or destroyed this control over it. And we are only concerned, therefore, in determining whether the constitution of Michigan has prevented the State Legislature from exercising complete control over the locality of elections, and whether, if such control is limited, the limitation is applicable to the subject before us."

The majority of the court find such a limitation of the power of the Legislature in the language of the constitution of that State, which I have already quoted, which provides that the elector must have—

"Resided in the township or ward in which he offers to vote ten days next preceding such election."

And hence they deny to the Legislature the power to pass this law, which prescribes other places for holding elections than the township or ward where the voter resides.

But to what elections does this language of the constitution of Michigan apply? Manifestly to the election of officers created by that constitution, and to no others. The court itself was a creature of that constitution, and had no authority to go beyond its limits and jurisdiction. If, then, I shall show that a higher power than State constitutions has prevented the State constitution, or the people in forming their State constitution, from thus limiting the Legislature in its control over the "locality of elections" of members of Congress, I shall then have shown that in the opinion of that court itself the Legislature of Michigan has undoubted power to fix the places where those elections shall be held.

It may be proper here to remark that this decision is the opinion of only a majority of the court. The chief justice of that court, in a very able opinion, maintains that notwithstanding this language of the State constitution, the Legislature has power to pass the law, and thus enable the qualified electors of that State who are absent in the military service of the United States to vote for their State and county officers. He claims, with great force, that if it had been the intention of the framers of the constitution to take away from the Legislature this undoubted authority, and prevent it from exercising this power, conceded to be an ordinary power of legislation, they would have used language plainer and more distinct than this expression, which is manifestly an incidental one, and is descriptive of the place of residence, and not the place of voting.

But I propose to show that the decision of that court, as well as the entire argument of the gentleman here, is irrelevant to the case now under consideration; because a higher power than the State constitution has restrained it from exercising any control over the places where the elections of members of Congress shall be held, and has expressly delegated that control to the Legislature of the State.

The fourth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States reads as follows, to wit:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof."

Thus absolutely requiring the Legislature of the State to do in regard to the election of members of Congress precisely what the majority of the court decide and the gentleman claims the State constitution forbids it to do in regard to the election of State officers, namely, to prescribe the places of holding those elections. Can language be plainer than this? The constitution of the State is not the Legislature of the State. The people, in convention by delegates forming their State constitution, are not the Legislature of the State. And I claim that under this clause of the Constitution of the United States no power in the State had any right to touch this subject at all except "the Legislature thereof."

The people of the Territory of Michigan were restrained by the Constitution of the United States before they formed their State. The delegates in the convention forming their State constitution were restrained by it, and could certainly enact no matter into the fundamental law of their State which that restraining power had expressly reserved from their control and delegated to another body to act upon.

And, Mr. Speaker, this provision of the Constitution of the United States is a mandatory provision—

"Shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof."

It requires the Legislature of the State to prescribe the places where the elections for members of Congress shall be held. The members of that Legislature had sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, even before they had sworn to support the constitution of their State. And under that authority—nay, under that requirement—they enacted this law prescribing the places where those elections should be held. And in accordance with the provisions of that law these 1,538 votes, which the gentleman claims should not be counted and allowed, were cast. And the only question for this House to decide is, whether the requirement of the Constitution of the United States is a sufficient warrant for the Legislature of the State to pass the law.

The gentleman also brings forward several decisions of the House in contested elections, which he claims establish precedents under which the seat must be given to him. And he has discovered that in one of them, the Oregon case, I myself voted here to sustain the very principle upon which he expects to obtain his seat. Wonderful sagacity! The gentleman has seen performed the play of Hamlet, but failed to notice that the part of Hamlet was left out. That case lacked the very point which must control the decision of the one now before the House. That point is, whether the Legislature of a State, acting under the Constitution of the United States, has power to pass a law which conflicts with the constitution of the State? There was no such question in the Oregon case, because there was no such conflict. The Legislature had accepted and acquiesced in the provision of the constitution, and had passed no conflicting law. Mr. DAWES, the chairman of the Committee of Elections, in the debate on that case, says:

"The sitting member does not claim to have been elected in pursuance of any law, or any constitutional provision whatever, but on the general right to representation which the people have. The contestant is here by virtue of an election, at a time and place fixed in the constitution of Oregon itself; in compliance with which the Legislature have forbore to this day to fix any other."

In another place he says:

"Now, the Legislature of Oregon has acquiesced, if nothing more, in the time fixed by the constitution."

And further on in the debate, he says:

"Either the Legislature of Oregon can, notwithstanding the provision of the State constitution, fix the time of the election of a member, because of the Constitution of the United States, or else the people of Oregon can do it through their constitution as well as through their Legislature."

He does not say which of these theories he would adopt if a case were presented in which he would have to decide between them. But in the whole debate he claims that the Legislature had, by its silence, accepted and acquiesced in the provision of the constitution, and hence in that case that provision was as binding here as if it had been an act of the Legislature.

I voted for the admission of the man, although he was the advocate of political views to which I am unalterably opposed, who had been elected by the people of Oregon at a time when it was universally understood by them that a member of Congress was to be voted for, and not for the admission of a man who, appealing from that decision of the people, had had a few votes cast for him as a member of Congress at a time when no one else dreamed that a member of Congress was to be voted for, and on the strength of such an election had presented himself here for admission to a seat. I should do the same thing again. But I protest that, in doing so, I am not to be understood as passing on such a case as the present one, where the election took place at a time and places established by law, and all the people understood that they were to vote for a member of Congress, and accordingly all parties took part in the election.

But there is another principle running through all the cases of contest which I claim may well be considered to establish a ruling precedent. It is very briefly and clearly stated in the report of the Committee of Elections of the Nineteenth Congress, in a case which came up from the then Territory of Michigan, in these words:

"The committee consider that it is only required of them to ascertain who had the greatest number of legal votes actually given at the election."

And in determining this fact the local law has been regarded as advisory and directory, and only so far essential as its violation was proof of fraud in the election. And the House has been controlled by the "greatest number of votes," provided they were actually given by qualified voters at a time when the whole people understood they were to vote for a member of Congress.

But the gentleman claims that under another provision of the Constitution of the United States the qualifications of an elector for a member of Congress are required to be the same as the qualifications of an elector for a member of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature; and inasmuch as these soldiers, under the decision of the court, could not vote for members of the State Legislature, therefore, they could not vote for members of Congress. The matter of fact is these soldiers did vote for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature; and when the question of the right of a member to hold the seat to which he had been elected by the soldiers' vote came up in that body, it was decided that they were entitled to hold the seats. And the men thus elected are to-day members of the Legislature of Michigan. This question, having been decided by the Legislature before the court made its decision, was reconsidered and reaffirmed after the court had made its decision. And that court itself has since recognized the complete right and duty of each House to decide this question upon its own judgment without reference to the action of the court.

I have here a copy of the Journal of the proceedings of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature of Michigan for 1865, and without going minutely into particulars, I find it here recorded that on the 7th of January the House took up the report of the select committee, to whom had been referred the contested-election case from the first district of Oakland county, and by vote awarded the seat to the claimant who had received the greatest number of votes, counting the soldiers' vote. The decision of this case seems to have been regarded as a virtual decision of all the cases, and the contestants either withdrew or suspended their claims and went to their homes. But after the decision of the court in regard to the county officers, upon which I have already commented, was made, they came back and renewed and pressed their claims. And I find recorded that on the 23d and 25th days of February the House again took up these cases and voted seriatim on each and every one of them, and confirmed the seats to those who had been elected by the soldiers' vote.

I have also in my hand a decision of the supreme court of Michigan, certified to by the reporter of that court, in which, in reply to an argument against the validity of one of the enactments of that Legislature, because its passage had depended upon the votes of these men, who it was claimed had not been legally elected, Judge Cooley, in giving the opinion of the court, which was concurred in by all the judges, distinctly affirms that upon the question of its own membership each House of the Legislature is clothed with "judicial power to decide both as to the law and the facts," and that "no other body or court has a right to review its decision." I plead this decision of the supreme court of Michigan, which the gentleman affects to so much respect, in answer to all his newspaper twaddle about the action of that Legislature with which he has attempted to enlighten this House.

But, Mr. Speaker, in regard to this matter of qualifications of electors. The votes of these soldiers were rejected by the court for no want of qualification in the elector. The offering to vote, the place of voting, or even the act of voting, forms no part of the qualifications of an elector. The supreme court of Michigan made no such decision as the gentleman claims. They made no decision whatever in regard to the qualifications of an elector. They simply decided that the place where the vote must be cast must be in the township or ward where the voter resides. The gentleman asserts that "the supreme court of Michigan holds that the place of voting is a qualification." Let us appeal to the record and see. First, Mr. Justice Christianity in his opinion in that case says:

"With these preliminary observations I proceed to an examination of the specific question involved in the present case. Does the Constitution prohibit the Legislature from authorizing, as they purport to have done by this act, the qualified electors of this State who may be absent in the military service of this State or of the United States to vote for officers of the State and national Governments at any other place than the township in which they respectively reside, and while they are absent from such township?"

The specific question then involved in that case was, according to this judge, as to the place where the qualified electors may vote. If they were already qualified electors, as he distinctly calls them, the place of voting adds nothing to their qualifications. It is not Justice Christianity, then, who holds that the place of voting forms part of the qualification.

Next Mr. Justice Cooley says:

"We find, then, on looking into the history of this provision, that the constitution of 1835, after fixing the qualifications of electors, added this negative clause, that 'no such citizen or inhabitant shall be entitled to vote,' &c."

And it was this negative clause, subsequently amended by the people in 1839, which, he claims, "Clearly requires the personal presence of the voter in the township or ward of his residence as a condition of his right to vote."

Not as a qualification, but "as a condition of his right to vote." And this negative clause was added, he declares, "after the qualifications had been fixed."

It is not Justice Cooley, then, who decided that the "place of voting is a qualification."

Next, as to Justice Campbell; and these are all the judges who concurred in the decision. He says, quoting part of the paragraph to which I have already called the attention of the House:

"And we are only concerned, therefore, in determining whether the constitution of Michigan has prevented the State Legislature from exercising complete control over the locality of elections; and whether, if that control is limited, the limitation is applicable to the subject before us."

This is his method of stating the specific question involved in the case.

Now, let us see how he decides this specific question. In the concluding paragraph of his opinion he says:

"In 1838 an amendment was proposed, and subsequently adopted, in these words: 'that so much of the first section of the second article of the constitution as prescribes the place where an elector may vote, and which is in these words, to wit, 'district, county, or township,' be abolished, and the following be substituted therefor, to wit, 'township or ward.'"

Judge Campbell proceeds:

"Here we have the construction by the people themselves, as the authors of the constitution, declaring this provision to be one of place, and making a change which could be of no avail except on that supposition. I cannot, therefore, attach to it any other meaning than that the voter must cast his vote personally in his own township or ward."

Judge Campbell then distinctly affirms, as the people of Michigan themselves have affirmed, that this provision refers to the "place where an elector may vote." Of course the constitution speaks of no other electors but qualified electors.

So far from any of these opinions asserting that the place of voting is a qualification, they all concede that the qualifications exist prior to and independent of the place of voting. I am to-day standing here nearly a thousand miles from the township of my residence as undoubtedly a qualified voter of that township as if I had never been out of it.

So were these soldiers, and if they had gone home, as many did, and reached the voting places in the townships of their residence the last hour, nay, the last minute before the polls were closed, no power on earth could legally have prevented them from voting, notwithstanding the constitution of the State requires a ten days' residence immediately preceding the election.

No, sir, these men possessed all the qualifications of voters, and the decision of the court simply declares that their votes were null and void in the case then before it, because they were not cast at the places where, in the opinion of a majority of the court, the State constitution requires the election of State and county officers to be held.

And I here again call attention to the fact that by the Constitution of the United States these three things, call them by whatever name you may, elements of qualification or legal requisites, or mere incidents as they are, "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for members of Congress" are expressly reserved from the control of the State constitutions. And I apprehend no man will claim that the State constitution may, by indirection, by calling these three things qualification of electors, obtain a control over them which it is expressly restrained and prohibited from exercising.

This view is greatly confirmed by an examination of the concluding words of the paragraph under consideration:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

This exception of the "places of choosing Senators" shows that this very subject of the place of voting was in the minds of the framers of that instrument, and by these closing words of the paragraph the place of voting is distinctly reserved to the ultimate control of Congress. Now, then, it is claimed by the honorable gentleman, and I freely admit it, that the power to fix the qualifications of voters is granted to the States, beyond the control of Congress.

If, now, the State may make the place of voting part of the qualification, Congress, having no power to interfere with the qualifications of voters, cannot "make or alter" any regulations in regard to it.

Hence, we are driven to the conclusion that the framers of the Constitution either understood that the place of voting forms no part of the qualifications of an elector, or else they inserted into that instrument a meaningless and impotent provision to regulate a matter which they had already surrendered entirely to the control of the States.

I do not believe that the framers of that Constitution, whose adaptability to all times and all circumstances has been so gloriously illustrated in the terrible struggle through which we have just passed, have inserted into that instrument any meaningless provisions.

Hence, I adopt the other alternative, and confidently assert that they understood that the place of voting could form no part of the qualifications of the voter.

The Michigan soldiers' voting law was carefully guarded in this respect. None but qualified electors, nay, more, none but those who were registered as qualified electors in the townships of their residence, were allowed to vote. And the votes of many who claimed and desired to exercise the right to vote were rejected for want of proof of registration in the townships where they claimed to reside. So carefully did the law guard the sanctity of the ballot-box, that in all the contests which have arisen under it—and I believe there were about fifty cases of contest—I have heard no word of fraudulent voting. And the gentleman himself, in the papers which he has filed in this case, makes no question here on that score, but simply denies the validity of the law for want of power in the Legislature to pass it. I think I have shown that the Legislature does possess the power to pass the law in case of the election of members of Congress, deriving it from the highest source of authority, the Constitution of the United States, by which it is made the duty of the Legislature to prescribe "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for members of Congress."

I think I have also shown that there is no collision between the decision of the supreme court of Michigan and the decision which I ask this House to make of the case before it. The court decided a case arising under the State constitution in regard to an officer created by that constitution, whose duties were all imposed by and whose responsibilities were to that constitution, and the majority of the court decided the case according to their views of the requirements of that constitution. I ask this House to decide a case arising under the Constitution of the United States in regard to an office created by that Constitution, whose duties and responsibilities are all imposed by that Constitution; and it seems to me that it can be decided only in view of the requirements of that Constitution; and it was under one of those express requirements that the law which alone gives rise to controversy in this case was enacted.

Mr. Speaker, I have also attempted to show that there is really no collision between these two constitutions. Each has acted in its own sphere, and has made such requirements upon the Legislature as the judgment of those who formed them pronounced necessary for the safety of the State.

But, sir, if there is a collision between these two constitutions, can it be questioned for a moment which is to give way? The Constitution of the United States is declared by itself to be "the supreme law of the land, anything in State constitutions or laws to the contrary notwithstanding." Why were these men not at home to vote at the places where the majority of the court decided they must cast their vote for State officers? Simply because Mr. Jefferson Davis and his accomplices, after proclaiming for years that State constitutions and State laws were superior to the Constitution of the United States, had finally taken up arms to maintain that heresy, and thus overthrew the Government of the United States. And you and I, Mr. Speaker, and many others who now surround me, voted here for the passage of a law under which these men might be called out—conscripted, if need be—to maintain the integrity and supremacy of that Government. We can justify the passage of that law in no other way but upon the ground that that Government is supreme and had a right to maintain its integrity. Under that call these men went forth, voluntary conscripts, to do battle for that great principle; and for four long years this question has been argued by the booming of cannon, the rattle of musketry, and the fierce bayonet charge upon the battle-field; and, sir, it has been decided. I shall not disparage that great argument by attempting, with any feeble logic of mine, to reargue here a question which has been thus decided there.

But I may appeal to this House, in the name of the thousands and tens of thousands of widows, to whom it is some consolation to believe that their husbands and protectors laid down their lives in a holy and justifiable cause while battling to maintain the integrity of their Government and the protection of that flag over those whom they loved more than life, not to take away that consolation by now declaring that after all these brave men were battling to maintain a falsehood, that the Government which they died to maintain is not a Government; in the name of the tens and hundreds of thousands of orphans scattered all over this broad land, whom we have taught to believe that the proudest memento in all their future lives will be the thought, "My father died at Gettysburg or Antietam or Vicksburg or in the Wilderness, to maintain the supremacy of that flag which I so much the more love," not to blot out that bright memento and cast disgrace upon the honored dead. And finally, in the name of the two million brave men whose living bodies for four long years formed the ramparts which protected our homes from the desolation of war, not to take away from them their only justification by declaring here that, after all, State constitutions are superior to the Constitution of the United States—the very heresy which they were exposing and sacrificing their lives to overthrow. I do not believe that such can be the decision of this House. I will not believe it till I am compelled by your vote to go out from here to proclaim it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise now to call the previous question, as I think this debate has gone far enough.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] yield to me a few minutes?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will yield to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] the leader of the Opposition, for five minutes, though I desire to retain the floor so that I may call the previous question when the gentleman gets through.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] can move the previous question now, and if it shall be seconded and the main question ordered, the gentleman will then be entitled to one hour for the purpose of closing the debate.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then I will move the previous question now, and yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] after it shall have been seconded.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I now yield to the gentleman from New Jersey for ten minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. I thank the gentleman for the courtesy which he has extended to me in allowing me an opportunity to make a few remarks upon this question. But at the same time I do not exactly like the insinuation he has thrown out that I claim to be the leader of this side of the House.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I know the gentleman is too modest to make the claim; I merely assigned the position to him. If he likes it better I will say "the misleader of the House."

Mr. ROGERS. I do not presume that there is any leader on this side of the House, but each man acts for himself. And even upon the other side of the House I notice that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] himself sometimes fails to lead; and it would not be strange if members on this side of the House should even disagree with me.

This question, Mr. Speaker, is one about which I have never had any doubt before; but after looking into the different reports presented here, I must say that there is some question in my mind about the true construction of the law upon this subject. I have never heard it contended that the organic law of the State had not the right to control the qualifications of the voters in the State, or the times, places, and manner of holding elections. In my own State, Senators of the United States are elected in joint meeting of the two Houses of the Legislature assembled together for that purpose, in accordance with the requirements of the organic law of the State. If the theory of the report of the majority of the committee be true, then the Legislature might annul the action of the organic law of the State of New Jersey in regard to electing United States Senators for that State. They might by a simple act of legislation, in contravention of the organic law of the State of New Jersey, decide that a Senator should not be elected in the manner laid down by the organic law.

And it has always been understood; it was so understood in Pennsylvania; it was so understood in New York; and it has been understood by lawyers and attorney generals in all the States where this question has come up about soldiers voting in the field, that it required a change in the organic law of the State before soldiers could vote outside of the domain of the State. I have never heard that understanding questioned. It was so admitted in my own State; it was so admitted in the State of New York; it was so admitted in the State of Pennsylvania. It was so decided in the State of Pennsylvania by the supreme court of that State; and it has been clearly and expressly so decided, I take it to be granted, by the supreme court of the State of Michigan, which has passed upon this point.

By the organic law of the State of Michigan it appears that the rules laid down in that law apply to elections of every character, as well of Federal officers as of State officers, and when the supreme court of Michigan passed upon this subject by its decision, it took into consideration the terms of the organic law, as they had the organic law before them, and they there decided that it prescribed the qualifications of voters, and that a part of those qualifications to entitle a person to vote was one which required him to have a residence in the township or ward a certain number of days before the election was held.

Now, I take it that when the Constitution of the United States gave the Legislature of a State the right to prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections, those rights were given subject to the organic laws of the different States, as they existed in the States at the time the Constitution of the United States was made. And every one of the States at the time the Constitution of the United States was formed had an organic law; and the Legislature of the State was the creature of that organic law, made by it to carry into operation certain powers within the limits of the grant given by its creator. And when the Constitution of the United States was made, our fathers had reference to the Legislatures as they existed in the States at that time, and they intended to confine the operation of the Legislatures to the powers conferred upon them by their creators—that is to say, the organic law of the different States as they existed at the time of the formation of the Constitution of the United States. In my own State the constitution was made before the Constitution of the United States was framed, and we remained under that constitution up to 1844. Then we had a new State constitution, and it was the first that we adopted after the adoption of the Federal Constitution.

Now, it does appear to me that we must look at the situation of affairs at the time when the Constitution of the United States was made. The States then existing under the power of their organic laws, had no power to enact any law except such as was given to their Legislatures by virtue of the organic law of the States, and the people that confirmed and ordained the Constitution of the United States did it with a view to the situation of the Legislatures as they existed at that time, and intended to give them no more power than they already had a right to exercise under their own organic law. And when they said that the Legislatures should prescribe the times and places of holding elections they meant that the State Legislatures were to be controlled by the organic law of the State. They did not mean by the adoption of the Constitution of the United States to override that organic law, and to allow the people of the States, in opposition to the express provisions of their own State constitutions, to regulate this matter in a different way from that which the organic law prescribed.

Therefore, if this be a correct view of the case, the only relation which "time, place, and manner" hold, is as to the time, place, and manner in which the elections shall be held, and it was never contemplated, intended, or dreamed of, that persons should have the right to vote at elections by proxy, or in any other manner except by coming up to the polls and voting in person, by ballot, each man for himself, so that the qualifications of the voter might be judged of, his demeanor when he came to offer his vote exhibited, and if any suspicion should be created by his actions or appearance, it might be an inducement for some one to challenge his right to vote.

Now, I presume it is not denied by the learned gentleman who is to close this debate, that the place of residence is a qualification of electors as much as the provision that the voter shall be twenty-one years of age.

The constitution of the State of Michigan lays down as a qualification that a man shall be twenty-one years of age before he can vote. I ask the gentleman whether the Legislature of Michigan, in contravention of that organic law, can say that a person of ten years of age may vote for Representatives?

Mr. SCOFIELD. The Constitution of the United States gives to each State the right to prescribe the places of holding elections, and it gives to the people of the State the right to prescribe the qualifications of voters; and age is one of the qualifications.

Mr. ROGERS. Is not residence one of the qualifications, too?

Mr. SCOFIELD. Well, if that is to be called a qualification, it is also fixing the place of holding the election, and that must govern. You cannot say that because the Constitution gives them the right of fixing the qualification of voters, therefore they have not a right to fix the place of holding the election. It is just equal to the stale anecdote of the doctor who converted all diseases into fits because his medicines were applicable only to that disease. The gentleman claims that because the State convention of Michigan could fix the qualifications of voters, they could, therefore, fix the place of holding the election as a qualification.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman does not answer my point at all. I will put it in a stronger light. Suppose the organic law of the State should say that no man should vote unless he has resided personally for ten days in the township where the election is to be held, and comes personally to the ballot-box on the day of election and puts his vote in the ballot-box, could the Legislature of the State, in defiance of that organic provision, pass a law that a citizen should not be required at all to come to the ballot-box and vote, but might vote by proxy, or in some other State, or Territory, or in some foreign country, wherever he might please?

The SPEAKER. The ten minutes allowed to the gentleman from New Jersey have expired.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will answer the gentleman's question out of my time. It is just the question I answered before, and the gentleman from New Jersey has not understood my answer. The Legislature, by the Constitution of the United States, fixes the place where the ballot-box shall be kept; that is, where the election shall be held. The State fixes the qualification of voters, and among those qualifications requires a ten days' residence in the township and three months' residence in the State, and that the voter shall be twenty-one years of age. Now, the voter having these qualifications deposits his ballot at the place fixed by the Legislature.

Mr. ROGERS. Still the gentleman does not answer my question. Suppose the organic law of the State of Michigan prescribed as a qualification that an elector should reside ten days in the township before the election, and that when the day of election comes, the elector shall go in person to the ballot-box and deposit his ballot, would that be a qualification?

Mr. SCOFIELD. The depositing the ballot would not be a qualification; the residence of ten days would.

Mr. ROGERS. Suppose the State provided in its organic law as a qualification that the elector should not vote unless he went personally to the ballot-box and put his ballot into the box, would not that be a qualification?

Mr. SCOFIELD. That is just what they did do in this case, only the ballot-box was to be in the camp where the soldiers were.

Mr. ROGERS. Allow me a moment?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I cannot give the gentleman all my time.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Well, if the gentleman thinks so, it is because he does not know the question he put.

I did not wish to give the gentleman an opportunity to make a speech, for I knew that, as he is a leader of the Opposition, "one blast upon his bugle-horn" is good for forty votes. I believe that is at present the number of the votes on the other side. They are diminishing so rapidly that it is difficult for one to keep himself rightly informed in reference to the matter.

Mr. ROGERS. Will not the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I yield for the present to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Cook.]

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me for a question?

Mr. COOK. I must decline to yield, as I hold the floor by consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, to propound a question to my colleague, [Mr. MARSHALL.] I listened to his argument yesterday with great attention. I wish now to ask him whether at the election at which he was first chosen a member of this House every vote polled for him was not void by the constitution of Illinois?

Mr. MARSHALL. No, sir. The constitution of Illinois of 1848 attempted to add to the qualifications prescribed in the Constitution of the United States for Representatives and Senators of the United States. In 1854, Mr. TRUMBULL and myself, who had both been upon the bench as judges, were elected to seats in this House. Before taking his seat, Mr. TRUMBULL was elected to the United States Senate. Both Houses of Congress held that the provision of the constitution of Illinois, which attempted to add to the qualifications of Senators and Representatives in Congress, was entirely in conflict with the Federal Constitution, and consequently void.

That is my answer to the question of my colleague. If he sees any analogy whatever between that case and this, he can see much further than I can. I was very unfortunate in my argument yesterday, if my colleague understood me as maintaining that a State constitution could override the Federal Constitution. I certainly took no such position, and I do not now.

Mr. COOK. Let me ask my colleague one other question. Whether the Legislature of the State of Michigan, which met two years ago, was not empowered by the Constitution of the United States to fix the place of holding elections for members of Congress.

Mr. MARSHALL. I endeavored yesterday to answer that question. I sought to prove that that Legislature had no such power if their act was in conflict with the constitution of the State. I do not think it necessary to repeat my argument at that point, for I imagine that the House would not hear it with much patience.

Mr. COOK. Then, as I understand, Mr. Speaker, the position is assumed that the constitution of the State may limit the Legislature in its power to fix the place for holding elections, but may not limit the people by saying for whom they shall vote. It seems to me that the cases are exactly parallel. If the people of the State of Illinois, in their constitutional convention, transcended their power when they enacted the provision which, if valid, would have rendered void all the votes cast for my colleague, then the people of Michigan, in their constitutional convention, transcended their power when they provided that the Legislature, which met two years after, should not fix the place of holding elections. The principle is precisely the same in both cases.

I desire to add a single word more. I have here an authority which may be entitled to some weight upon this question. The Committee on the Judiciary in the Senate have had before them a question in reference to the election of a Senator from New Jersey. In reporting upon that question the committee use this language:

"The constitution of New Jersey does not prescribe the manner of choosing United States Senators; as, indeed, it could not, the Constitution of the United States having vested that power, in the absence of any law of Congress, exclusively in the Legislature."

The power of the Legislature to provide the places for holding elections for Representatives rests on precisely the same authority as the power to elect Senators. If the constitution of New Jersey could not prescribe the manner of choosing Senators, it could not prescribe the manner of electing Representatives. So far as the authority goes, it is precisely in point.

Mr. ROGERS. With reference to the choice of Senators, the Federal Constitution itself declares that Senators shall be elected by the State Legislatures.

Mr. COOK. Yes, sir; and the Constitution itself declares that the Legislature shall prescribe the places of holding elections. The language of the Constitution with reference to the two cases is precisely similar.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I now want five minutes myself.

The Constitution of the United States says that the Legislature of a State shall prescribe the place of holding an election. In Michigan the Legislature of that State did prescribe the place where the soldiers should vote; they prescribed the camp where they happened to be in the field as the place. Now, why is not that constitutional? The Constitution gives this duty as clear as language can give it to the Legislature, and the Legislature clearly performs that duty.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL.] told us yesterday that the reason why the Legislature of Michigan could not perform that duty was because it was the creature of the constitution of Michigan. Suppose the Constitution of the United States had used the word "creature," if he wants it so, could they not have prescribed the place of holding elections just as well as if they were called by the more dignified word of Legislature?

Again, he tells us that the Constitution of the United States did not mean the Legislature, but meant the people of the United States.

Mr. ROGERS. Let me ask a question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Not now. I am talking to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL.]

The Constitution of the United States says, in one place, that the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. Take the gentleman's reading, and it will be, shall have the qualifications of the most numerous branch of the people, not of the Legislature of a State. Which is the most numerous branch of the people? I suppose they should be divided into sexes. If so, in New England the ladies would be the most numerous branch, and in the gentleman's State the gentlemen.

Mr. MARSHALL. The gentleman will allow me a word. He does not intend to misrepresent me, I know, although in fact he is doing so. I said that the term Legislature, in its broadest sense, meant the people, who, in the first place, held the legislative power which they delegated to the conventions assembled to form the State constitutions; and those conventions, in the organic laws, delegated it to the ordinary Legislatures.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will give the gentleman another example if he thinks his definition is accurate. Last session we passed a law submitting an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to the different States, and the Legislatures of three fourths of them have adopted it. The language of the Constitution is that when the Legislatures of three fourths of the States shall adopt it, it shall be a part of the Constitution. Now, according to the logic of the gentleman from Illinois, the Legislature means the people, and it must be submitted to three fourths of the people of the States. Mr. Seward has announced that the amendment has been adopted, but according to his theory, as it has been only sanctioned by three fourths of the Legislatures of the States, and not of the people, it is not part of the Constitution of the United States.

The Constitution of the United States in another place says that Congress may submit these amendments either to the Legislatures of the States or to conventions. Under the Constitution the State of Michigan might say they should not have any convention and the Legislature should not act upon it, and the Constitution of the United States would be nullified. That, sir, is evidence that the framers of the Constitution knew what they were about when they used the word Legislature. They used it in the same sense that we do. It is enough to say there were thirteen States then in existence, and each one had a Legislature at the same time this Convention was in session, and all those States either had a constitution or a charter in existence at that time, and if they had meant something besides a Legislature eo nomine, would they not have been likely to have said so? You may go through the Constitution of the United States and you will find the word Legislature used some dozen or fifteen times, and every time indicating it meant the same as we mean in the history of this country, the Legislature that originates under the Constitution.

Mr. ROGERS. Suppose the Legislature of the State of Michigan should refuse to elect Senators, how can we compel it to do so?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not know. My friend from New Jersey might issue a mandamus on them. It has nothing to do with this question.

Mr. SPALDING. I want to ask a question. I desire to know if there be any objection to the votes cast for the sitting member other than those which appertain to their being soldiers in camp away from home.

Mr. SCOFIELD. That is all.

Mr. SPALDING. Would they have been legal voters if at home?

Mr. SCOFIELD. Yes, sir, every one of them.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to ask a single question. I wish to know whether, if the proposition the gentleman maintains be true, it does not involve the question that the constitution of Michigan is itself unconstitutional so far as the Constitution of the United States is concerned?

Mr. SCOFIELD. It involves the question, then, whether the Constitution of the United States says that the Legislature shall fix the places of holding elections. Now, if the constitution of Michigan says it shall not do it, then these two constitutions are in conflict. And I suppose nobody, since the war, will say that the State constitution is so sovereign that it overrides the Constitution of the United States. As to the question to be settled, whether it is in conflict or not, I refer the gentleman to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. DAWES,] who said yesterday that they were not in conflict. I think they are, and, of course, I think the Constitution of the United States is supreme, and that that of Michigan must yield.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me one further question on this subject? Supposing the State constitution had existed at the time when this provision of the Constitution of the United States was adopted, would that provision of the Federal Constitution annul the provision of the Michigan constitution? Take the case, for instance, of New Jersey, referred to by our friend from that State, [Mr. ROGERS,] which had a constitution in existence prior to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. Now, does it follow that the Constitution of the United States, subsequently adopted, abdicates or annuls the constitution of the State of New Jersey?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I take it that all State constitutions are subordinate to the Constitution of the United States without regard to age.

Mr. UPSON. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] answer me this question? The constitution of Michigan prohibits the Legislature from electing a Governor to the United States Senate, and declares any such vote void? Does the gentleman consider that as one of the qualifications that the Constitution of the United States was intended to regulate?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not think that question is involved in this discussion. The question which I put to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] I think he has not undertaken to answer. But I wish to inquire further, whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania does hold that the adoption of the Constitution of the United States may, by its provisions, annul a prior existing constitution of a State.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I believe I have already answered that it does not make any difference how old the State constitution is.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me five minutes.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will.

Mr. DAVIS. The question seems to have arisen here as to the intention of the people of this country in adopting the Federal Constitution, which is the organic law of the land, whether they intended, in adopting the Constitution of the United States, to detract from the power of any State constitution. I am surprised that in this day that question should be addressed to any member upon this floor. What was the very purpose of the adoption of our Federal Constitution? The Confederation had been tried, and it had failed. It was found that there was not power enough in the Confederacy to carry on the operations of the Government; that the Legislatures of all the States held all powers except those that had been delegated through the Articles of Confederation to the Government created by those articles; and when they came to adopt the Constitution of the United States, the people of all the States, everywhere throughout the whole country, made that the supreme law, and took away from every State constitution any power which conflicted in any wise with the provisions of the Federal Constitution. Therefore, when they said that the Legislatures of each State should prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections of Senators and Representatives, they meant that that power should be exercised by the State Legislature. It was a power given to them by the Constitution of the country, a power conferred upon the State, to prescribe the manner, the time, and the place in which those elections should be held.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] asks whether it would be possible to compel a State to cause this election? Perhaps not. The southern States have already assumed the ground that they ought not to be compelled to do this. If they fail to do it they must suffer the consequence. But their failure does not alter the operation of the law.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a single statement?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. I rise simply to express my surprise at the intimation which has been thrown out here, that if the Legislature of any State should fail to make provision for the election of Representatives to this House Congress has no power to remedy the default. Such an idea utterly ignores a vitally important provision of the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution, which declares that—

“The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.”

Now, sir, the proceedings of the Convention that framed the Constitution, the discussions in the various State conventions which ratified that instrument, and the action of the First Congress of the United States, in 1789, when an effort was made to restrict and practically destroy, by constitutional amendment, this supervisory power of Congress, combine to show that the ultimate control of the Congress of the United States over the elections for Representatives in the various States was deemed by the great men who framed the Constitution as of vital consequence, in order to enable Congress to protect the people's right of suffrage and representation, and in an extreme contingency to prevent the dissolution of the Government. The proceedings to which I have referred show clearly that the great object in authorizing Congress to “make or alter the regulations” in regard to the election of Representatives was that, if any State or States, by improper action or by refusal to act, should attempt to deprive the people of their rightful representation in this House, the Congress of the United States, acting in this respect as the ultimate guardian of the citizen, should interpose with controlling power to secure to the people the right of suffrage and a just and equal representation in the national councils.

Mr. DAVIS. It was not my purpose to bring up that point for discussion to-day. The gentleman from Pennsylvania the other day made an argument on that subject, and I am content with that. I pass it by. All I have to say is, that the Legislature of each State has a duty to perform under the Constitution, and that is, to prescribe the time, places, and manner in which elections shall be held for Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Now, I hold that if any conflict arises between the Federal Constitution and any State constitution, the State constitution is null and void, for, if we have a nation in this country, the Constitution of the Federal Government is supreme.

What has been done in this case? The constitution of the State of Michigan, as I understand, has not prescribed the time and places and manner of holding elections in that State, but it allows the Legislature to do it, and the Legislature has done it. There is no conflict. The Legislature of the State, in entire subordination to their own constitution, and without conflict with it, prescribed the mode, time, and places in which the election for Senators and Representatives of the United States should take place. They fixed the place of election in the field, where I think they had the constitutional power to do it. I think it is right to exercise liberality in our judgment in cases of this nature. By whom was this right of franchise to be exercised? By the soldier who had left his home and fireside to fight the battles of the Union, and he had left behind him too many men who were opposed to the interests and supremacy of this Union. I will not consent, unless I am compelled to it by convictions of duty, to withhold from any soldier in the field the right to protect his Government by his ballot as well as his bayonet.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's five minutes have expired.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will now yield to my colleague on the committee from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] for five minutes.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee of Elections I thought, perhaps, it would not be amiss, even after all the discussion that has occurred, for me to allude to one or two propositions made by my excellent colleague on the Committee of Elections, [Mr. MARSHALL.]

One was this: he holds that where an act of the Legislature fixes the camp as the place of holding the election that it is not a fixation of the place within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States. Now, I suggest to my friend that if he is right in that, then all the laws of the several States—and there have been quite a number of them doing this same thing—are worthless, are void. My own State, the great State of Pennsylvania, I believe the State of New York, and quite a number of other States, have done precisely that thing, to wit, fixed the camp as the place of voting, and that was the only thing that could be done from the very nature of the case. If, therefore, this House should give significance and force to the suggestion of my learned friend, they would be simply deciding that all these laws fixing the places of soldiers voting are unconstitutional, and that not only now, but in all the future, we can never make it constitutional for a soldier to vote, because we cannot fix the place of voting. That is one point.

Mr. MARSHALL. Will the gentleman allow me one moment?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. If it is not an intrusion on the House, I certainly will.

Mr. MARSHALL. Well, I ask the gentleman to state, if a law providing that any citizen of a State might vote at any place where he might happen to be on the day of election, would be a law prescribing a place at all?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. No, no; oh, no.

Mr. MARSHALL. Well, then, let me ask the gentleman another question: if any number of men, say a dozen or a hundred, in a regiment shall vote at one place where they may happen to be on the day of election, is that fixing the place of election at all?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I will answer that question in a way perfectly satisfactory, I think, even to my friend. Suppose that the law should provide that the place of election in a given county should be the court-house, of course the court-house may be moved, here to-day, there to-morrow, and in another place the next day. It is an old axiom in law that is certain which can be made certain. The fixing of the court-house is a fixation of the place, because it can be made certain; and so here, when you fix the camp of a given regiment as a place of voting, it is a fixed place.

Mr. MARSHALL. Another question, then. If an act was passed providing for taking the vote of an elector at any place in the world, where he might happen to be on the day of election, is not that a fixing of the place just as much as the other?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. We might get ourselves into a maze of difficulties by supposing unimaginable cases.

Mr. MARSHALL. Does not the gentleman get himself into just such a trouble?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. No, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman allow me to make a correction of his statement in regard to the laws of the State of Pennsylvania?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I shall deprive myself of the opportunity of stating what I rose to state, if I am not permitted to finish my statement.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well, go on and make misstatements.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. There is no importance anyhow in what I said about Pennsylvania.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then the gentleman ought not to have said it.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. It is said, in addition, as an objection to the majority report of this committee, that by the position we take we override the constitutions of the several States, and we thereby nullify the constitutions of the States. Now, I submit, in reply to that suggestion, that any position we can possibly take upon this subject will result in precisely the same thing, because the Constitution of the United States itself prescribes, in this same clause, that the place that is fixed, whether it be fixed by the State Legislature or the State constitutional convention, may be altered by act of Congress; so that a worse dilemma may arise on the other side. They might rise here and ask me, can you override the constitutions of the States by an act of Congress? Why, certainly you can.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman will allow me, it is not a question of overriding the constitution of a State by act of Congress, but of overriding the constitution of the State by the Legislature of the State.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The legislation of the State was in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore it is an effort to override the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. DAWES. That is begging the whole question.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Now, I do not know, nor is it necessary that I should know, that I fully comprehend the suggestion made by the chairman of the committee, [Mr. DAWES:] but I will answer any suggestion upon that point by saying this: suppose the constitution of my State should fix the county seat of my county as the place of holding elections within that county in all coming time. Is it not obvious to every one that although that provision was in the constitution of Ohio, yet it could be altered by act of Congress, under the last part of the clause in the Constitution of the United States providing that Congress may alter the times, places, and manner of holding elections? Who will get up here and say that that cannot be done? And yet the argument made on the other side, that we are undertaking to override the constitution of the State, is exactly as defective in the view I have now put as it is in the other view: indeed, more so, because it might be said with much more force that you shall not be permitted by act of Congress to override the terms of the State constitution when it might be overcome by the higher, the supreme provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

Then these are the only two points that I rose to notice: first, that the place of voting is fixed when you fix the camp where the regiment or the soldier may be, as much as it can be fixed in the nature of the case. And if you hold that a more definite fixation of the place is requisite, then you can never have a valid soldiers' voting law under the Constitution of the United States.

The other point is, that you do not override the constitution of any State by providing that the Legislature may change the places of voting fixed by that constitutional law of the State; because the provision of the Federal Constitution names the Legislatures of the States simply as the mere instrumentalities for fixing the places for elections of Federal officers.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I think we have had debate enough on this subject, and I now call for a vote upon it.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. MARSHALL to strike out all after the word "resolved," in the following resolution, reported by the Committee of Elections:

Resolved, That Rowland E. Trowbridge is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Ninth Congress from the fifth congressional district in Michigan.

And to insert the following:

That Hon. Rowland E. Trowbridge is not entitled to hold the seat now occupied by him in this House as a Representative from the State of Michigan.

Resolved, That Augustus C. Baldwin has been duly elected as a Representative from the State of Michigan to the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and is entitled to a seat in this House.

Mr. MARSHALL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 30, nays 108, not voting 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bergen, Boyer, Chanler, Eldridge, Fiske, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Hogan, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Kerr, Le Blond, Marshall, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Radford, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, and Voorhees—30.

NAYS—Messrs. So the amendment was rejected.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. DAWSON stated that he had paired with Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, and that Mr. ANCONA had paired with Mr. MOORHEAD.

Mr. RADFORD stated that Mr. WINFIELD was absent on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. COBB stated that Mr. McINDOE was detained from the House by indisposition.

Mr. BOYER stated that Mr. ANCONA was absent on account of his continued illness.

The result was then announced as above stated.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the resolution reported by the committee.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee of Elections the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of this House to Hon. A. C. Baldwin, contestant of the right of Hon. R. E. Trowbridge to a seat in this House the sum of $1,500, in full, for time expended and expenses incurred in said contest.

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will only say that the sum named in this resolution was unanimously agreed upon by the committee as the amount that should be properly paid to this contestant.

Mr. STEVENS. I should like to know whether this sum is the amount of the regular per diem and mileage.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The mileage and monthly pay would be $1,500. We have fixed an even sum.

Mr. STEVENS. I see no objection to that.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does this amount include the monthly pay from the commencement of the congressional term, or only for the session of Congress?

Mr. SCOFIELD. Only for the session. It includes three months' pay and mileage. I now call the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment, that I may offer an amendment. I desire to move to add after the words "$1,500" the words "and mileage."

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will yield to allow the amendment to be offered, if it will be understood, by unanimous consent, that the yeas and nays shall not be called upon it.

Mr. SPALDING. I will call the yeas and nays.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then I cannot yield. I am confident that the amendment would not prevail.

Mr. WARD. I give notice that I shall demand the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution. I am opposed to the whole principle of paying contestants.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I insist on the call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. WARD. I call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM SAWYER AND OTHERS, OF OHIO.

Mr. LE BLOND. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a joint resolution that it may be taken up and acted on at the present time. It provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall be authorized to appoint a commissioner to reappraise the lands described in an act entitled "An act for the relief of William Sawyer and others, of Ohio," approved July 2, 1864, provided, however, that the occupants of said lands shall pay the expenses of reappraisal.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. LE BLOND. I ask my colleague to withdraw his objection, inasmuch as this is a matter peculiar to our own State. If it is desirable to him I will have it referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. SPALDING. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. LE BLOND. I ask that the resolution be put on its passage.

Objection was made.

The joint resolution was then read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

CHOLERA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States transmitting, for the consideration of Congress, correspondence between the Secretary of State and the minister of France accredited to this Government, and also other papers, relative to an international conference at Constantinople on the subject of cholera; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SELECT COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER also appointed the following as the select committee on a Bureau of Education ordered by the House:

Messrs. GARFIELD of Ohio, PATTERSON of New Hampshire, BOUTWELL of Massachusetts, RANDALL of Pennsylvania, DONNELLY of Minnesota, MOULTON of Illinois, and GOODYEAR of New York.

TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That, in the judgment of this House, the internal duty or tax on distilled spirits ought not to be reduced.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I object.

BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. JENCKES. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER stated that the regular order of business was the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The eleventh section was pending when the House passed from the consideration of the bill on Friday last.

The pending amendment, moved by Mr. HOTCHKISS, was as follows:

Strike out in lines thirty-six and thirty-seven of section eleven the words "marshal of said district;" in line thirty-seven the words "as messenger;" in lines forty and forty-one the words "until the appointment of an assignee;" and insert at the end of line thirty-six the following:

General assignee in bankruptcy residing in the county where such bankrupt resided at the time of filing his petition; and thereupon the estate of such bankrupt shall vest absolutely in such assignee for the purposes of this act; and the district judge of each district shall appoint a general assignee in bankruptcy for each county within his district, who shall be a resident of the county for which he is appointed, and shall give such bond as shall be required by such judge, and shall be an officer of the court, and subject to its rules and orders.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] is entitled to the floor on a pro forma amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. Speaker, the object of the amendment pending is to improve one of the sections of this bill. If I could get some of the lawyers around me to attend to it I would like to inform them what the section is. It provides in every case of voluntary bankruptcy an assignee shall be appointed to administer the bankrupt's estate; and it provides also that in every one of these cases a deputy marshal shall intervene for a mere preliminary purpose. My point is, that the interposition of a marshal is quite unnecessary, that it necessitates an expense which is useless, and the creation of a large number of officers entirely useless.

I say, in answer to a suggestion made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ALLEY,] that my argument is not at all in favor of official assignees, but my point is, that the assignee which, under the section as it stands, is to be appointed in every case should, from the outset, be present and take charge of the estate, thus dispensing with the necessity for a deputy marshal. Now, there is but one objection to this which any one has struck, and that is, that the creditors will not be able, in the first instance, to select the assignee; that the trustees will not be nominated by the cestui que trust. In my judgment, that is no objection whatever to the matter. Under the section as it stands, a friendly and managing creditor will be quite apt to manage and control the proceedings in nine cases out of ten. So, if the section as amended gives to the court the power to appoint an assignee at once, and then to change it upon cause shown, two objects will be accomplished: first, the marshal and this cloud of deputies will be dispersed; and second, the creditors will be assured of an assignee proper, active and acceptable to them, because, if the court makes a mistake, a change will be made on their suggestion.

Now, to my mind it is entirely clear that the whole purpose may be accomplished by allowing the assignee to be appointed, to begin with, to act as messenger and as assignee, and the glaring objection to this section at the same time can be avoided. I make this suggestion in friendship to this bill, for I would like to vote for a good bankrupt law—not an insolvent law, not a law which will sponge out debts and last till that is done and then be repealed; but a law which will take its place as part of the permanent commercial system of the country. If we can have that, I shall be very glad for one to give it my vote. And I suggest, with great respect to the committee, that they may make a mistake in adhering too strongly to all the technical parts of this bill.

The objection which I now seek to enforce comes to me from judges and from lawyers who understand this subject thoroughly, and from one lawyer especially—I might say it without disrespect to this committee—who knows as much about this subject as any gentleman who will take part in this discussion. He thinks, and others think, that this section is exceedingly objectionable. I agree that it is, and I suggest to the committee whether, without adopting necessarily the idea of an official assignee, they had not better dispense with a provision which, for the reason I have indicated, and which I would indicate more at length if I had time, is, I submit, unnecessarily objectionable.

The SPEAKER. Debate is now exhausted on the amendment to strike out the last line, and that amendment, the Chair understands, is withdrawn.

Mr. JENCKES. I move to strike out the last two lines, for the purpose of replying to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.]

It seems to me, and I think it will to every one who reflects upon this subject, that the objection of the gentleman from New York is based upon a misapprehension of the duties of this person called a messenger. There must be an intermediate time between the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, whether a voluntary petition or a petition in invitum, by the creditors before adjudication, by consent, by a register, or by the court upon hearing, and the—

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Will the gentleman yield while I correct a statement he is making? The section under consideration provides that the filing of the petition shall be an act of bankruptcy in and of itself, and that, therefore, the party shall be declared bankrupt. When that petition is filed the judge is obliged to decree him a bankrupt.

Mr. JENCKES. I yield no further. The gentleman convinces me more and more that he is mistaken. The person who files the petition may be adjudicated a bankrupt, it is true; but what is to become of his property between that time and the time of the appointment of the assignee?

Mr. HOTCHKISS. The assignee is appointed in advance.

Mr. JENCKES. Not at all.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. If the gentleman will read my amendment and say that it is not so, I will withdraw it.

Mr. JENCKES. I understand that. The principal merit of this bill, in the opinion of the committee, if there is any merit in it, is this: that the debtor and creditors may act together, and that the creditors appoint the assignee and not the debtor, subject to the approval of the court; and the business of these messengers is simply to perform the preliminary business required—to take custody of the property, give the notices, and see that the meeting of the creditors is held.

Mr. CONKLING. Why should not the court appoint the assignee?

Mr. JENCKES. Because insolvency is a matter between debtor and creditor, and if they can arrange it, the court should simply indorse what they agree to. If they cannot, then it is for the court to interfere. Now, the duties of messengers are to take possession of the books, papers, and property of the bankrupt. The next step is to call the creditors together, and as soon as they meet the duties of the messenger are at an end; because the first duty of the creditors when they assemble is to nominate an assignee who will be confirmed by the court, if a proper person, if not, the court will appoint an assignee.

Now, the gentleman says that this appoints new officers. Not a single one. Supposing there is an official assignee; he would have to send the clerk or messenger or some one in his employment to take possession of the property.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the gentleman allow me to state what I am talking about? I am not advocating an official assignee.

Mr. JENCKES. Very well.

Mr. CONKLING. What does the gentleman mean by telling this House that this does not provide for the creation of new officers?

Mr. JENCKES. Not one. There must be some person to do this duty, must there not? I ask the gentleman the question as a lawyer.

Mr. CONKLING. If the assignee is to do it no one else is required to do it.

Mr. JENCKES. But the assignee cannot be appointed till nominated by the creditors.

Mr. CONKLING. That is begging the whole question. He can be, and should be.

Mr. JENCKES. That is another question. If the gentleman wishes the court to appoint an official assignee, let him say so. That is the precise objection to all previous systems of bankruptcy.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the gentleman mean to say, as a lawyer, that if the court designates an assignee, that of itself makes him the official assignee?

Mr. JENCKES. No; but if, when the creditors meet, they remove that assignee, if the creditors have the power to do that, the person the gentleman calls an assignee is but a temporary assignee, and performs simply the duties of a messenger.

Mr. CONKLING. Well, that obviates the necessity of all these public officers.

Mr. JENCKES. Not at all.

Mr. CONKLING. Surely it does.

Mr. JENCKES. The reason for calling him a deputy marshal is to get the advantage of the marshal's bond and not to intrust the property of the debtor to a person who is not responsible for it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island. I do not want anything stricken out or put in, or anything to pass. I think the most unpopular law the Congress of the United States ever passed was the last bankrupt bill. It killed a party, and I do not want a party, a good, respectable party, to be killed by another such law. [Laughter.] I do not think you could find any law ever passed or that could be passed so unpopular in an agricultural community as a bankrupt law. I should not have much objection to one applying to the cities, although, generally speaking, an honest insolvent there can always get a liberal arrangement and compound with his creditors.

Mr. JENCKES. Never.

Mr. STEVENS. But this is not the time, when all rebeldom is in debt to us, to pass a law to free them from their debts. It is the last day on earth—

Mr. JENCKES. I call the gentleman from Pennsylvania to order. He is not speaking to my amendment or to the subject before the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I thought the gentleman had moved to strike out the last three lines and I was opposing that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. JENCKES. The gentleman is taking an opportunity to make remarks to which no reply can be made.

Mr. STEVENS. I am speaking against striking anything out.

Mr. JENCKES. Well, I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, but at the same time the Chair must state that the gentleman from Rhode Island did not confine his remarks very closely to his amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I did not understand what he was talking about. [Laughter.]

Mr. JENCKES. I know you did not.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman did not talk about his amendment, I am sure; however, if the Chair thinks I am out of order, of course I will not persist.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must confine himself to the amendment, which is to strike out the last three lines.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, sir, I do not think the House ought to strike out these lines, because the gentleman from Rhode Island thinks that would improve the bill, and I do not think the bill ought to be improved. [Laughter.]

Mr. JENCKES. Then I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. HOTCHKISS's amendment, and being put, there were—ayes 81, noes 81; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOTCHKISS and JENCKES were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 82, noes 60.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALE. I move further to amend this eleventh section, by inserting after the close of the forty-ninth line the words, "and stating the names and residences of the creditors, and the amounts of their respective debts, so far as the same are stated in the petition or schedule of the debtor;" so that that portion of the section will read, as follows:

Send written or printed notice, by mail or otherwise, to all creditors upon the schedule filed with the debtor's petition, or whose names may be given to him, in addition, by the debtor, and to give such personal or other notice to any persons concerned as the warrant specifies; which notice shall state:

First. That a warrant in bankruptcy has been issued against the estate of the debtor; and stating the names and residences of the creditors, and the amounts of their respective debts, so far as the same are stated in the petition or schedule of the debtor.

Mr. Speaker. I think the purpose of this amendment will at once be manifest to any gentleman who is acquainted with this bill. It is in effect requiring that when the notices in bankruptcy are served, each creditor shall be informed of the names and residences of those who stand in the same relation with himself to the estate of the debtor. It was, I think, a material defect in the former bankrupt bill that it omitted to give such information. It seems to me that it is in the highest degree proper and desirable that whenever a bankrupt issues notices, or whenever notices are issued upon the finding of the commissioner of bankruptcy, each creditor should be informed of the parties who are situated as he himself is, and of the amount due each. These creditors occupy a common position in regard to the estate of the bankrupt, and they should have some means of information as to who are the parties interested, in order that they may have an opportunity of consultation.

Is the amendment I have offered acceptable to the chairman of the committee, [Mr. JENCKES?]

Mr. JENCKES. Upon a voluntary petition that might be so. But the gentleman will see, by turning back, that that is a portion of the proceeding to be regulated by the commissioner upon an involuntary petition.

Mr. HALE. I do not understand that to be so. This is the first step to bring the parties together.

Mr. JENCKES. If the gentleman will allow me, I will show that it is unnecessary; because the duty of the messenger is to send notice to every creditor, and nothing is done until the creditors meet. When the petition is a voluntary one, the schedule must be filed, and it shows who the creditors are. And as soon as the creditors meet they know each other.

Mr. HALE. I think the gentleman fails to understand my point.

Mr. JENCKES. I do not. But I think it ought not to be in the law, but left to the code to be prescribed.

Mr. HALE. I think it should be in the law. The law prescribes the contents of the notices to be issued by the messenger. And I say that the notice, the thing that gives the creditors information, ought to advise him who are the parties interested in the matter in like manner with himself, so that he may have an opportunity for consultation and comparison of views with them, before he decides that he will ever appear or take any steps whatever.

Take, for instance, the city of New York, which is perhaps the great creditor city of the country. A merchant of New York receives notice of the filing of a petition of his debtor. By this bill, as it stands, he is to have no other information. Now, if in that same notice he can be told, what can be told very briefly and readily, and with very little additional expense, who the other creditors are, and what are the amounts due them, he will have information which will be of great importance to him.

Mr. JENCKES. With the permission of the gentleman I will suggest an amendment to another portion of the section, which I think will accomplish the purpose he has in view: to insert after the words "creditors of the debtor" the words "their names and the amounts of their debts so far as the same may be known." That portion of the section will then read:

Send written or printed notice, by mail or otherwise, to all creditors upon the schedule filed with the debtor's petition, or whose names may be given to him, in addition, by the debtor, and to give such personal or other notice to any persons concerned as the warrant specifies; which notice shall state:

1. That a warrant in bankruptcy has been issued against the estate of the debtor.
2. That the payment of any debts and the delivery of any property belonging to such debtor to him or for his use, and the transfer of any property by him, are forbidden by law.
3. That a meeting of the creditors of the debtor, their names, and the amounts of their debts, so far as the same may be known, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of his estate, will be held at a court of bankruptcy, to be holden at a time and place designated in the warrant, not less than ten nor more than ninety days after the issuing of the same.

Mr. HALE. That is my proposition.

Mr. JENCKES. I will accept the one I have indicated, if the gentleman will move it.

Mr. HALE. I am satisfied with that, and will accept it.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I desire to offer two other but merely verbal amendments, in lines forty-two and forty-three. It now reads, "send written or printed notice, by mail or otherwise, to all creditors," &c. I move to amend by striking out the word "send" and insert the word "serve;" also to strike out the words "or otherwise to" and insert the words "or personally on;" so that it will read, "serve written or printed notice, by mail or personally on all creditors upon the schedule," &c.

Mr. JENCKES. I have no objection to that. The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to amend the eleventh section by striking out after the word "bankrupt," in the thirty-first line, the following words:

And the judge of the district court, or if there be no opposing party, any register of said court, to be designated by the judge, shall forthwith, if he be satisfied that the debts due from the petitioner exceed $500, issue a warrant, to be signed by such judge or register.

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

And the clerk of the district court shall forthwith, if he be satisfied from such petition that the debts due from the petitioner exceed $500, issue a warrant signed by him, under the seal of the court, and tested in the name of the district judge; and.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the chairman of the committee will consent to this amendment when he understands its effect. In all cases in the district court, when the proper paper giving the court jurisdiction is placed on file, the warrant or attachment, whatever the process may be, is issued by the clerk as a matter of course; and it is issued here as a matter of course, whenever a petition is filed showing more than $500 worth of property on the part of the bankrupt.

Now, in order to make the proceeding under this bill harmonize with other proceedings of a like character in the district court, this warrant should be issued by the clerk under seal, and tested, as every other process is tested, in the name of the district judge. I do not see why a distinction should be made here, and the power given to a judge or to a register, such register being, perhaps, five hundred miles away from the clerk's office, to issue a warrant, when the seal is of necessity in the clerk's office.

Mr. JENCKES. If the proceedings were voluntary only, the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. POMEROY] would be proper; but he will see at once that the subject which he wishes to cover by his amendment is one that must be embraced within the code of practice. In all cases of voluntary application, the course indicated by him would be pursued; but in cases of involuntary proceedings, there must be the act of a judge or a register.

Mr. POMEROY. This section relates to voluntary proceedings only.

Mr. JENCKES. But the gentleman, if he looks further, will see that the section relating to involuntary bankruptcy adopts all the proceedings prescribed for voluntary bankruptcy, so as to avoid having two codes in the same act. But the rules to be prescribed will meet the case which the gentleman desires to cover. The method of proceeding which he proposes could not be adopted and ought not to be adopted in proceedings against a debtor.

Mr. POMEROY. Then the section should provide that in cases of involuntary assignment the warrant shall issue only upon the direction of the judge or the register, while it should also provide that in all other cases the warrant shall be issued by the clerk.

Mr. JENCKES. The gentleman will readily see that in the cases for which he proposes to provide the warrant could be issued under a standing order of the court, without making a special provision in the law. The judge may delegate his authority to that extent, if there be no opposing party. But, in involuntary proceedings, there is necessarily an opposing party whose case requires the consideration and action of the judge. The phraseology of the bill in reference to this matter was adopted for the sake of simplicity, in order to cover both classes of proceedings, leaving it to the discretion of the judge to make a standing order with reference to voluntary proceedings. I think that the gentleman will see the propriety of withdrawing his amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to doing so if the gentleman will consent to a provision in the bill that the warrant shall be issued under the rules and regulations to be established by the court.

Mr. JENCKES. The bill already contains such a provision. The tenth section provides that a judge of the Supreme Court, with the assistance of five commissioners, shall frame general orders for the regulation of the practice and procedure in all cases.

Mr. POMEROY. Exactly. But they cannot regulate proceedings which are specifically provided for in the act. They cannot dispense with anything that the act requires to be done.

Mr. JENCKES. The provisions of this bill correspond with the provisions of our present statutes with reference to other proceedings in the district court. In a case in admiralty the clerk issues his warrant by virtue of the rules established by the Supreme Court of the United States. The law requires the judge to issue the warrant. The law also authorizes the judges of the Supreme Court to establish the rules of practice. Under the rules which will doubtless be adopted in these cases of bankruptcy the clerk will issue the warrant, as a matter of course, where there is no opposing party.

Mr. POMEROY. If the gentleman thinks that that end can be effected, it is all I ask.

Mr. JENCKES. It can be, I have no doubt.

Mr. POMEROY. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk then proceeded with the reading of the bill.

The fourteen section was read, as follows:

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That as soon as said assignee is appointed and qualified, the judge, or, where there is no opposing interest, the register, shall, by an instrument under his hand, assign and convey to the assignee all the estate, real and personal, of the bankrupt, with all his deeds, books, and papers relating thereto, and such assignment shall relate back to the commencement of said proceedings in bankruptcy, and thereupon, by operation of law, all such property and estate, both real and personal, shall vest in said assignee, although the same is then attached on mesne process as the property of the debtor, and shall dissolve any such attachment made within six months next preceding the commencement of said proceedings: Provided, however, That there shall be excepted from the operation of the provisions of this section the necessary household and kitchen furniture, and such other articles and necessities of such bankrupt as the said assignee shall designate and set apart, having reference in the amount to the family, condition, and circumstances of the bankrupt, but altogether not to exceed in value in any case the sum of $500; and also the wearing apparel of such bankrupt, and that of his wife and children, and the uniform, arms, and equipments of any person who is or has been a soldier in the militia or in the service of the United States; and such other property as now is, or hereafter shall be, exempted from attachment or seizure or levy on execution by the laws of the United States; and the determination of the assignee in the matter shall, on exception taken, be subject to the final decision of the said court: And provided further, That no mortgage of any vessel or of any other goods or chattels, made as security for any debt or debts, in good faith and for present considerations and otherwise valid, and duly recorded, pursuant to any statute of the United States, or of any State, shall be invalidated or affected hereby; and all the property conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors; all rights in equity, choses in action, patents and patent rights and copyrights; all debts due him, or any person for his use, and all liens and securities therefor; and all his rights of action for property or estate, real or personal, and for any cause of action which the bankrupt had against any person arising from contract or from the unlawful taking or detention of the property of the bankrupt; and all his rights of redeeming such property or estate with the like right, title, power, and authority to sell, manage, dispose of, sue for, and recover or defend the same, as the bankrupt might or could have had if no assignment had been made, shall, in virtue of the adjudication of bankruptcy and the appointment of his assignee, be at once vested in such assignee; and he may sue for and recover the said estate, debts, and effects, and may prosecute and defend all suits at law or in equity, pending at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy, in which such bankrupt is a party in his own name, in the same manner and with the like effect as they might have been presented or defended by such bankrupt; and a copy, duly certified by the clerk of the court, under the seal thereof, of the assignment made by the judge or register, as the case may be, to him as assignee, shall be conclusive evidence of his title as such assignee to take, hold, sue for, and recover the property of the bankrupt as hereinafter mentioned; but no property held by the bankrupt in trust shall pass by such assignment. No person shall be entitled to maintain an action against an assignee in bankruptcy for anything done by him as such assignee, without previously giving him twenty days' notice of such action, specifying the cause thereof, to the end that such assignee may have an opportunity of tendering amends, should he see fit to do so. No person shall be entitled, as against the assignee, to withhold from him possession of any books of account of the bankrupt, or claim any lien thereon; and no suit in which the assignee is a party shall be abated by his death or removal from office, but the same may be prosecuted and defended by his successor, or by the surviving or remaining assignee, as the case may be. The assignee shall have authority, under the order and direction of the court, to redeem or discharge any mortgage or conditional contract, or pledge or deposit, or lien upon any property, real or personal, whenever payable, and to tender due performance of the condition thereof, or to sell the same, subject to such mortgage, lien, or other incumbrances. The debtor shall also, at the request of the assignee, and at the expense of the estate, make and execute any instruments, deeds, and writings which may be proper, to enable the assignee to possess himself fully of all the assets of the bankrupt. The assignee shall immediately give notice of his appointment, by publication at least once a week for three successive weeks, in such newspapers as shall, for that purpose, be designated by the court, due regard being had to their general circulation in the district, and shall, within six months, cause the assignment to him to be recorded in every registry of deeds or other office within the United States where a conveyance of any lands owned by the bankrupt ought by law to be recorded; and the record of such assignment, or a duly certified copy thereof, shall be evidence thereof in all courts.

Mr. ROGERS. I move to amend by striking out in line twelve, page 17, the words

"within six months next preceding," and insert "any time after."

Mr. JENCKES. There are several amendments to be proposed to this section, and as they ought to be considered in a full House, I will let members give notice of them, and then I shall move that the House adjourn.

Mr. SLOAN gave notice of the following amendment:

In section fourteen, line fifteen, strike out all from and including the words "the necessary household" down to and including the words "of the said court" in line twenty-nine, and insert in place thereof, "all property, real, personal, and mixed, which is exempt from attachment or seizure, and sale on execution by the laws of the State in which the judicial district in which such proceedings are pending is situate: Provided, That the foregoing exception shall operate as a limitation upon the conveyance of the property of the bankrupt to assignee, and in no case shall the property hereby excepted pass to the assignee or the title of the bankrupt thereto be impaired or affected by any of the provisions of this act.

Mr. KASSON gave notice of the following amendment:

Add to the section:

And provided further, That the real property which, in any State and in accordance with the laws thereof, shall, at the time of the act of bankruptcy, be owned and used by any bankrupt as his homestead, exempt from execution in such State, shall be exempted from seizure and disposition by the assignee, and shall not be embraced within the operation of the law.

Mr. HALE gave notice of the following amendment:

After "detention of," in line forty-two, insert "or injury to."

Mr. JENCKES. I accept that amendment.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, gave notice of the following amendment:

Strike out all of line eleven after the word "and" in said line and lines twelve and thirteen, up to and including the word "proceedings," in line thirteen.

Mr. HOLMES. I move the following amendment to section eleven:

After the word "district" in line thirty-seven, page 13, insert the following:

Or to one of the creditors of said bankrupt, to be designated by said judge and residing in the same county with said bankrupt, whose debt shall not be less than $300.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to go back unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. THAYER. I object.

And then, on motion of Mr. JENCKES, the House (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 15, 1866.

Prayer by Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 18th instant, calling for the report of Major Reynolds of the exploration of the Yellowstone river, transmitting a letter from the chief of the engineer department, from which it appears that the report called for is not yet completed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, this communication will be laid upon the table.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It merely shows why the information cannot be sent.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

The communication was laid upon the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented a resolution of the Legislature of Ohio, against the passage of any law under which the General Government shall assume the war debt of the several States, incurred in raising and paying bounties to volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition of citizens of Michigan engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements, praying for a reduction of the taxes on the sales of agricultural implements; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented the petition of Lewis Tappan, praying that in all enactments the colored people may be treated as white citizens; which was referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

He also presented the petition of Seward C. Nelson, J. F. Brooks, and others, citizens of De Witt county, Illinois, praying for such legislation as will equalize the bounties paid to volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. NESMITH presented the petition of Colonel A. J. Slemmer and other Army officers, praying for increased compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. HARRIS. A few days ago I obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition and other papers relating to the claim for services during the revolutionary war of the heirs of Joshua Chamberlain. I now desire to represent the petition and papers accompanying it, and I move that they be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I present the memorial of five hundred colored soldiers of the fifty-sixth regiment United States colored infantry, stationed at Helena, Arkansas, in which they say:

"We the undersigned colored soldiers do respectfully petition your honorable body in behalf of ourselves and our colored brethren.

"We ask equality before the law, the same rights and privileges accorded to white men. Believing that without the safeguard of suffrage freedom will be of little permanent benefit to our people. We ask your honorable body not to admit the representatives of our late masters until we shall be allowed a voice in the elections.

"We do not ask social equality, for a higher law than human must forever govern social relations. Our people are now making zealous efforts to educate themselves, and if loyalty, wealth, industry, or intelligence be made the test of suffrage, we are willing to submit; but we beg that color be no longer permitted to exclude us from the rights and privileges of other men.

"In the name of four million people who have been under all circumstances loyal to the Government, of one hundred and eighty-six thousand loyal colored soldiers who have served in the late war, of sixty-eight thousand of our dead comrades, in the name of God, humanity, and justice, we implore you not to surrender us again to the mercies of the white people of the South."

I move that this memorial be referred to the committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADE also presented a memorial of the "Friends' Association of Philadelphia for the Aid and Elevation of the Freedmen," praying that the right of suffrage be conferred irrespective of race or color; which was referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. SUMNER. I have in my hands a memorial and protest signed by George T. Downing, Frederick Douglass, Lewis H. Douglass, A. W. Ross, and others, being a delegation representing the colored people of the several States now sojourning in Washington. They memorialize the Senate of the United States by way of protest against a proposed amendment to the Constitution which is now pending in this body. They set forth in their memorial that being here in Washington and charged with the duty of looking after the best interests of the recently emancipated, they most respectfully but earnestly pray this honorable body to favor no amendment to the Constitution of the United States which will grant or allow any one or all of the States of this Union to disfranchise any class of citizens on the ground of race or color for any consideration whatever. They further respectfully represent that the Constitution, as adopted by the fathers of the Republic in 1789, evidently contemplated the result which has now happened, to wit, the abolition of slavery. The men who framed it and those who adopted it, framed and adopted it for the people, and the whole people, colored men being at the time legal voters in most of the States. In that instrument, as it now stands, there is not a sentence nor a syllable conveying any shadow of right or authority by which any State may make color or race a disqualification for the exercise of the right of suffrage; and they say they will regard as a real calamity the introduction of any words expressly or by implication giving any State or States such power; and they respectfully submit that if the amendment now pending shall be adopted it will enable any State to deprive any class of citizens of the elective franchise, notwithstanding it was obviously framed with a view to affect the question of negro suffrage only. For these and other reasons they respectfully pray that the amendment to the Constitution recently passed by the House and now before this body be not adopted.

"I do not know that I have at any time presented a memorial which was entitled to more respectful consideration than this, from the character of its immediate signers and from the vast multitudes they represent. I hope I shall not depart from the proper province of presenting it if I express my entire adhesion to all that it says, and if I take this occasion to entreat the Senate, if they will not hearken to arguments against the pending proposition, that they will at least hearken to the voice of these memorialists representing the colored race of our country. I ask that the memorial lie upon the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. SUMNER. And I am about to add that during my long service here, and the many petitions I have presented, I have never before asked to have a petition printed; but it seems to me, considering the character of these memorialists, the importance of the subject, and that it is bearing upon a proposition now directly before the Senate, that it ought to be printed. I therefore move that it be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Territories, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 141) to provide for the erection of public buildings in the Territory of Dakota; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 38) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi river at the city of St. Louis, State of Missouri, and at the city of East St. Louis, State of Illinois, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 31) to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and provisioning militia forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of James Bawden, praying for relief, reported a bill (S. No. 142) for the relief of James Bawden; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

POST OFFICE BALANCES.

Mr. DIXON. I am directed by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. No. 29) for the transfer of funds appropriated for the payment of salaries in the Post Office Department to the general salary account of that Department, to report it back with an amendment. I am also instructed to ask that the joint resolution be considered at this time. It is a matter of considerable public interest.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that the unexpended balances on the books of the Treasury Department, from the respective sums of money appropriated by Congress, as per different acts of Congress, for the salaries of Postmaster General, Assistants Postmaster General, clerks, temporary clerks, additional clerks, messengers, watchmen, laborers, and superintendent and clerks of the money-order system, including the amounts appropriated for the payment of twenty per cent. increase of certain salaries—all of the same being appropriations made by Congress for the Post Office Department—may be transferred on the books of the Treasury Department, from the respective headings under which they are now placed, to the credit of the Post Office Department, to the general salary account of funds placed to the credit of the Post Office Department.

The amendment proposed by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was in line five to strike out the words "Congress, as per," so as to read:

That the unexpended balances on the books of the Treasury Department, from the respective sums of money appropriated by different acts of Congress.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to the amendment, but I shall move, then, to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance. It needs some consideration.

Mr. DIXON. I ask that a letter be read from the Postmaster General explaining the necessity for this bill.

The Secretary read, as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 12, 1866.

Sir: The moneys appropriated for the payment of salaries in this Department are credited on the books of the Treasury Department, under different headings, corresponding to the respective acts of Congress by which such appropriations were made.

The disbursing clerks of this Department have not drawn from all these different classes of salary funds; hence large balances remain under certain heads, while under others there remain but small amounts, not sufficient to meet the current expenses of the office. The transfers asked for will enable the present disbursing clerk to draw from the general salary account, under which he can make settlements; and such transfer will neither increase nor diminish the amount of appropriations, nor divert funds from the objects intended by Congress, namely, the payment of salaries.

For example, none of the appropriation for the payment of "superintendent and clerks" of the "money-order system" has ever been drawn, they having been paid from the "general salary account;" and the transfer requested will be, in fact, a reimbursement of those accounts that have been exhausted in the payment of others.

The necessity for the adoption of the "resolution" is immediate, to enable the disbursing clerk to draw for the payment of the salaries of the current month. I have, therefore, to respectfully ask that the inclosed "resolution" be at once adopted, a request I would have earlier made had I been aware of the embarrassments referred to.

Very respectfully,

W. DENNISON,
Postmaster General.

Hon. JAMES DIXON, United States Senator.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let the resolution lie over. The policy has always been against transferring from one account to another. I do not know but that this resolution is well enough, but I should like to examine it further before it is passed. I move that the resolution lie on the table for the present.

Mr. DIXON. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance. The Senator then will have an opportunity to examine it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will regard the motion to lay on the table as withdrawn, and the question is on the motion to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 143) to revive and extend the provisions of an act granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the States of Arkansas and Missouri to aid in the construction of a railroad from a point upon the Mississippi opposite the mouth of the Ohio river, via Little Rock, to the Texas boundary, near Fulton, in the State of Arkansas, with branches to Fort Smith and the Mississippi river, approved February 9, 1853, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill

(S. No. 144) to provide for the improvement of the Rock Island or Upper rapids and the Lower or Des Moines rapids of the Mississippi river; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 145) for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Northern Kansas railroad and telegraph; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate take up for consideration the bill (S. No. 138) to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States.

Mr. STEWART. That bill will take considerable time and occupy the morning hour for many days. I have been waiting for an opportunity to call up the Colorado bill, but I have been postponed repeatedly. I think we ought to act upon it very soon, and I am opposed to taking up the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts until the Colorado bill has had a hearing.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to the Senator that I do not think the Colorado bill can be very well acted upon in the morning hour, and I think he had better let that bill lie a few days until after we dispose of the constitutional amendment. As to the bill which I now propose to call up, I think we can have it read this morning and work upon it in the morning hour, so that we may be ready to dispose of it soon.

Mr. STEWART. If we put off the Colorado bill until we get done with the constitutional amendment we may wait for two months; indeed, I do not know that we shall ever see the day when that will be disposed of. If we can have the morning hour for a few days I think we can soon dispose of it; but this bill of the Senator from Massachusetts will occupy a great deal of time.

Mr. WILSON. I think we can make some progress in it this morning, and I hope there will be no objection to proceeding with it.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope this bill will not be thrust into the morning hour. I do not know of any bill that can better afford postponement than the bill to reorganize the Army of the United States. Not only is it more important to decide promptly on the bill concerning the admission of Colorado, but there are other questions pending that have been partly considered which are of great consequence, and which I think ought to have precedence.

Mr. WILSON. I differ from the Senator from California. I think the military bill ought to have been passed a month ago. There are several regiments of volunteers in the service to-day who say their time is out, who want to go home, who allege that they are held in the service in violation of the contracts made with them now that we have peace. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction in some localities.

Mr. CONNESS. And others who wished to remain in the service have been dismissed.

Mr. WILSON. I think we should go on with the bill. I do not wish to press it unreasonably; but I want it worked along with as far as reasonably can be done. I think we can have it read this morning, and that will call attention to it. I do not think there can be much opposition to the bill now.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. What is the motion before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am merely desirous to have a vote of the Senate as to whether they will give preference to the Colorado bill, and with that vote we shall be content. I should like very much to have a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question as soon as the debate shall have terminated.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I want to antagonize this motion, if I can, by another motion, so as to get the sense of the Senate as to the question of taking up the Colorado bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no desire to interpose any delay to the consideration of the Colorado bill; but the Senate must see that that is a bill which will cause a certain amount of discussion; it remains to be seen how much. To take it up now, when we have but twenty minutes before the morning hour expires, it seems to me would not be an economical arrangement of our business. Now, as I understand, my colleague proposes to take up his bill, which is a very important one, and to have it read. It must be read; and it will then be launched before the Senate; and I presume he does not expect to go any further with it to-day. We really cannot make much headway with the Colorado bill between now and one o'clock.

Mr. STEWART. We can get the question before the Senate. I have deferred calling it up owing to suggestions from different quarters, and have yielded the preference to matters of which it had precedence for over two months. The Committee on Territories reported the bill over two months ago, and recommended its passage; it has been lying on our tables. The members-elect are waiting to know what action is to be taken. They desire action. If we do not get it before the Senate now, if we wait until the military bill shall have been considered in the morning hour for several days, the rest of the session being occupied by the constitutional amendment, it will be a long time before we get the Colorado bill up. I think it is due to the parties who have been elected to seats to have a decision on the question. It is a very simple proposition and ought to take but little time; it can be well understood in a few minutes; but if we are to have a discussion on it I think it due to the subject and to the parties who are waiting that that discussion should be commenced. If the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts was a bill that was to occupy but a few moments I should not be so tenacious, but to take up a bill which is to consume the morning hour for several days I consider unfair. This bill has precedence in point of time, and I hope the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts will be voted down.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow the friends of the Colorado bill to get the sense of the Senate on taking it up? Will he withdraw his motion and allow the Senator from Nevada to make his motion to take up the Colorado bill, so that we can get at the sense of the Senate?

Mr. GRIMES. The Senators who are in favor of immediate action on the bill for the admission of Colorado can vote against the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, and that will be a test vote.

Mr. STEWART. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I do not wish to place myself, nor do the friends of the Colorado bill wish to place themselves, in a position of antagonism to the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WILSON. I express the opinion to the Senator from Kansas that the Colorado bill, from what I hear, will lead to quite an extended debate. I thought that the bill to which I called attention could be taken up this morning and read. There are only a very few sections as to which there will be any debate. I do not expect that the debatable portions will be reached this morning. I want to have the attention of the Senate directed to the bill. I shall not press it to-day or to-morrow, or make a speech on it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The Senator from Massachusetts is aware that Congress almost unanimously passed an enabling act for Colorado. The people of that State have formed a constitution and elected their Senators and Representative, and they are here. The only question is as to their excluding one hundred negroes from the right of suffrage. That question, the question of negro suffrage, is being discussed on other bills. It seems to me that the Colorado bill can be settled by a vote of the Senate without a great deal of discussion, but if we are to have discussion, the sooner we take up the bill the better. It is true, as the Senator from Massachusetts is aware, that the Colorado bill was first introduced, first reported by the committee, first before the Senate, and ought to be disposed of before the bill moved by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] We have unanimously decided to admit their Senators on the floor of the Senate; they are here; and it partakes somewhat of a question of privilege. I again repeat that I would like to have the Senator from Massachusetts permit the motion to be made so that we can have a vote on it.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me that my friend from Kansas does not appreciate all the questions involved in what he calls the Colorado bill. He says that it is simply a little question—little to him, perhaps—of whether one hundred colored persons shall vote. A great question that, sir, whether one hundred persons on account of their color shall be shut out from the exercise of the elective franchise—not a little question as the Senator suggests.

But that is not all. The Senator assumes that Colorado has come here under an enabling act. When the Senate enter upon the discussion they will see very clearly that she does not come here under the enabling act; that she has called together a convention on her own motion, the operation of the enabling act passed by Congress having expired. I do not pretend to say at this stage of the discussion what will be the value of that conduct, to what extent it should affect our conclusions; but Senators will see that there is clearly a question involved beyond that great one to which the Senator from Kansas has alluded.

There is then also another question, whether the State of Colorado at this moment has a population such as would justify our receiving two Senators on this floor, putting her on an equality with New York and Pennsylvania. On that I express no opinion now. I merely open that question, that the Senate may see what is involved in what is called, compendiously, the Colorado bill. Now, sir, with ten months before us I think we had not better enter upon it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I expressed no such idea as that this was a little question, and it does not come with a very good grace from the Senator from Massachusetts to say to me—

Mr. SUMNER. I understood the Senator to say so. If he did not, of course I stand corrected.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I undertake to say that one who has devoted eleven years of his life to the cause of freedom should be secure from such an imputation as that from the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. I only intended to quote the Senator's words. If I did not hear him correctly, of course I stand corrected.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I used no such language.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; then I was mistaken.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I said that the only question was as to granting the suffrage to one hundred blacks in Colorado, and that that question was being discussed day by day upon other measures that are pending before the Senate. Let me say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the question of negro suffrage is as important to me as to him. It occupies and absorbs me as much as it does him, or any Senator, and that, and other questions connected with the freedom of the black man, has occupied me and my constituents for eleven long years. We may differ, and I presume we will, as to the manner and time of granting that right; but as to the great question of giving every man over twenty-one years of age the right of suffrage in this Union, who is qualified to exercise it, that question is as important to me as to him.

Nor did I say that Colorado came here under an enabling act. An enabling act was granted by Congress when Colorado had a less population than she has now. Nebraska is taking the same steps toward organizing a State government, and under the same theory as Colorado is organized. What the friends of Colorado ask is, that we may have the sense of the Senate upon the proposition to admit her. It is but just to Colorado and important to Nebraska that such a vote should be had at an early day. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] is not in his seat. I was going again to request him to withdraw his motion so that the question may come up on the naked proposition of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. SPRAGUE. As one of the members of the Military Committee, I desire to draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that the volunteers of our Army are, as the war is now over, unwilling to serve as such any longer. The Lieutenant General is embarrassed day by day with constant complaints from officers and men, and by desertions from those volunteer regiments, and he is earnestly anxious that whatever is done by Congress in relation to this bill shall be done quickly. It is to me far more important that the matters connected with the States lately in rebellion should be attended to first, rather than those in the far West yet in their unorganized condition. I trust that the Senate will realize and understand the position of the Lieutenant General, the military authorities, and the people throughout the country who are anxious to have their military affairs strengthened in every possible way. I trust the bill indicated by the Senator from Massachusetts will be taken up, will be read, will be discussed, and will be acted upon finally and quickly, so that the country will have something before them upon which they may feel secure.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will withdraw his motion and let us take the sense of the Senate on taking up the Colorado bill.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator can have the sense of the Senate just as well on my motion to take up the Army bill. The Senate will decide which it prefers to take up first.

Mr. STEWART. That is not fair, because a portion of the committee who reported that bill will have to sustain the chairman of the committee in calling it up, although they are favorable to the Colorado bill, and it is putting the Colorado bill under a disadvantage. If he will exonerate his committee, so as to let every man express his opinion, I do not know that I would object.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot withdraw the motion.

Mr. STEWART. Then I call for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the Senator from Massachusetts had better withdraw his motion, as it will take more than the residue of the morning hour to call the yeas and nays, and of course his bill cannot then be considered, as we have a special order at one o'clock.

Mr. CLARK. But if he withdraw his motion, the question will come up on the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well. I only made the motion to save time.

Mr. GRIMES. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not withdraw his motion. I think it vastly more important that we should carry out the suggestions that have been made by the chairman of the Military Committee and the Senator from Rhode Island, and do something toward disbanding the dissatisfied men who have volunteered into the service and been kept over what they claim to be the time for which they enlisted than that we should take up this Colorado bill, which can be disposed of at any time.

Mr. STEWART. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be withdrawn by unanimous consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered. No objection being made, the call for the yeas and nays is withdrawn. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The bill (S. No. 138) to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. It provides that the military peace establishment of the United States shall hereafter consist of five regiments of artillery, twelve regiments of cavalry, fifty regiments of infantry, the professors and corps of cadets of the United States Military Academy, and such other forces as are provided for by the act, to be known as the Army of the United States.

The five regiments of artillery provided are to consist of the five regiments now organized; and the first, second, third, and fourth regiments of artillery are to have the same organization as is now prescribed by law for the fifth regiment of artillery; but the regimental adjutants, quartermasters, and commissaries are hereafter to be extra first lieutenants.

To the six regiments of cavalry now in service there are to be added six regiments, having the same organization as is now provided by law for cavalry regiments, the first and second lieutenants of which, and two thirds of the officers in each of the grades above that of first lieutenant, are to be selected from among the officers and soldiers of volunteer cavalry, and one third from officers and soldiers of the regular Army who have served two years in the field during the war, and have been distinguished for capacity and good conduct; and four of the companies from each regiment may be armed and drilled as infantry at the discretion of the President; but each cavalry regiment is hereafter to have but one hospital steward, and the regimental adjutants, quartermasters, and commissaries are hereafter to be extra first lieutenants.

There are to be fifty regiments of infantry, to consist of the ten regiments of ten companies each now organized; the nine remaining regiments so distributed that each battalion, with the addition of two companies, shall constitute a regiment of ten companies, and five additional regiments of ten companies each, and all the vacancies in the grades of first and second lieutenant, and two thirds of the vacancies in the grades above that of first lieutenant, are to be filled by selection from the officers and soldiers of volunteer infantry or artillery, and one third from officers and soldiers of the regular Army who have served two years during the war, and have been distinguished for capacity and good conduct in the field; and eight regiments to be composed of colored men, to be officered by officers of colored troops, who have served two years during the war, and who have been distinguished for capacity and good conduct in the field; but promotions in the colored regiments are to be confined to the regiments of that corps.

The volunteer officers to be selected for appointment under these provisions are to be distributed as nearly as may be among the States, in proportion to the number of troops furnished during the war.

Each regiment of infantry is to have one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, two majors, one regimental commissary, (an extra first lieutenant,) one adjutant, (an extra first lieutenant,) one regimental quartermaster, (an extra first lieutenant,) ten captains, ten first and ten second lieutenants, one sergeant major, one quartermaster sergeant, one hospital steward, one commissary sergeant, two principal musicians, and ten companies, and each company is to have one captain, one first and one second lieutenant, one first sergeant, four sergeants, eight corporals, two artificers, two musicians, one wagoner, and fifty privates, and the number of privates may be increased to one hundred, at the discretion of the President, whenever the exigencies of the service require such increase.

Each regiment in the service of the United States may have a band, (as now provided by law,) and there are to be one ordnance sergeant and hospital steward for each military post, and the same number of post chaplains as now provided by law; and the President of the United States is to appoint for the national cemeteries already established, or to be established, a superintendent, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of an ordnance sergeant, to be selected from the non-commissioned officers of the regular Army and volunteer forces who have received certificates of merit for services during the war.

All enlistments into the Army are hereafter to be for the term of five years, and one major for each regiment is to be appointed when four companies shall have been organized, the lieutenant colonel when six companies shall have been organized, the colonel and second major when the organization of the regiment is completed; and not more than one officer for each company is to be appointed to any regiment or company until the minimum number of men shall have been enlisted and the command duly organized; and recruits may be collected at the general rendezvous in addition to the number required to fill the regiments and companies herein provided for, if the number does not exceed in the aggregate three thousand men.

There are to be one lieutenant general, five major generals, and ten brigadier generals. The adjutant general's department is hereafter to consist of the officers now authorized by law, namely, one adjutant general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; two assistant adjutant generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; four assistant adjutant generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry, and thirteen assistant adjutant generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry. There are to be four inspectors general of the Army, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry, and eight assistant inspectors general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry.

The provisions of the act for the better organization of the quartermaster's department, approved July 4, 1864, are to continue in force for one year longer.

The number of military storekeepers is not to exceed sixteen.

The subsistence department is hereafter to consist of the officers now authorized by law, namely, one commissary general of subsistence, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; two assistant commissary generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; two assistant commissary generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry; eight commissaries of subsistence, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry; and sixteen commissaries of subsistence, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry.

Upon the recommendation of the Surgeon General, the Secretary of War may detail a surgeon as chief medical purveyor, who, while performing such duty, is to be in charge of the principal purchasing and issuing depot of medical supplies, and have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry; and not to exceed five medical officers as assistant medical purveyors, who, while performing such duty in the different geographical divisions or departments, are to have the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry.

The pay department of the Army is hereafter to consist of one paymaster general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; two assistant paymaster generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; two deputy paymaster generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry; and sixty paymasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry; and the vacancies created in the grade of major are to be filled by selection from the persons who have served as additional paymasters two years during the war.

The corps of engineers is to consist of one chief of engineers, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general, six colonels, twelve lieutenant colonels, twenty-six majors, thirty captains, and twenty-six first and ten second lieutenants, who are to have the pay and emoluments now provided by law for officers of the engineer corps.

There is to be one chief signal officer of the Army, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry. The Secretary of War may detail from the Army, upon the recommendation of the chief signal officer, six officers, and not to exceed one hundred non-commissioned officers and privates, to be taken from the battalion of engineers, for the performance of signal duty; but no officer or enlisted man is to be detailed to serve in the signal corps until he shall have been examined and approved by a military board, to be convened by the Secretary of War for that purpose; and officers, while so detailed, are to receive the pay and emoluments of cavalry officers of their respective grades; and enlisted men, while so detailed, are, when deemed necessary, to be mounted upon horses provided by the Government.

No person is to be commissioned in any of the regiments authorized until he shall have passed a satisfactory examination before a board, to be convened under direction of the Secretary of War, which shall inquire into the services rendered during the war, capacity, and qualifications of the applicant; and such appointment, when made, is to be without regard to previous rank, but with sole regard to qualifications and meritorious services. Persons applying for commissions are not to be entitled to any compensation for expenses incurred in reporting to the board for examination.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is now before the Senate, being the joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] to the joint resolution reported by the committee; and upon that question the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Senate in support of the resolution. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HENDRICKS in the chair.) Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to add at the end of the joint resolution the words, "and they shall be exempt from taxation of all kinds;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation, and they shall be exempt from taxation of all kinds.

Mr. SUMNER. I withdraw that amendment for the present, in order that the first vote may be taken on the general proposition, and I shall offer it at a subsequent stage of the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The Senator from Massachusetts withdraws his proposition, and the question now before the Senate is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] to the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.]

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desired to submit some remarks to the Senate upon this proposition, but did not expect to do it this evening; and I forgot to bring with me the notes I intended to use. I do not like to ask a postponement of the vote, but I know that another Senator, who could not be here this afternoon, desires to speak, and I suppose what I shall desire to say, and also his remarks, may be made to-morrow. I know, also, that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. YATES] desires to be heard, but is not in a condition of health to speak either to-day or perhaps to-morrow. He was very desirous that the final vote should not be taken until Monday evening, so that he could be heard on Monday. I presume we could have a vote on Monday evening, if that would be agreeable to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no interest in this matter other than that which I share in common with every other Senator. I am desirous, of course, to have this question disposed of as soon as it can be with propriety, giving every gentleman a chance to be heard upon the subject. It has dragged along now for nearly two weeks. It is not for me, simply because I have charge of this joint resolution, to insist upon pushing the matter beyond what is reasonable and proper. I do not desire to place myself in that position.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think the Senator has done that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But I wish to say to all gentlemen that this question has taken up a great deal of time, and it is important to finish it as soon as possible, as many of the State Legislatures are now in session; and I feel that if members desire to address the Senate they must be prepared to go on and do so without a postponement from day to day for the purpose of allowing every gentleman to make his speech in the morning, and then adjourning early every evening. We shall never get through in that way. It has not been customary, after a question has been under debate as long as this resolution has been, to extend that indulgence. I desire to get along with this measure as fast as I can without appearing discourteous; but I submit the matter entirely to the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator from Indiana does not desire to go on now, and the Senate is not disposed to insist on further discussion now, I will move that the further consideration of this joint resolution be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 132, to prevent and punish kidnapping.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have this joint resolution made the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. CLARK. I move that it be postponed to, and made the special order of the day for, to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And I give notice to gentlemen that I shall begin to be a little more quarrelsome—I do not know that it will do any good—after to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The motion was agreed to.

PREVENTION OF KIDNAPPING.

Mr. CLARK. I now move that the Senate proceed to consider the bill (S. No. 132) to prevent and punish kidnapping.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that if any person shall kidnap or carry away any other person, whether negro, mulatto, or otherwise, with the intent that such other person shall be sold or carried into involuntary servitude, or held as a slave; or if any person shall entice, persuade, or knowingly induce any other person to go on board any vessel or to any other place, with the intent that he or she shall be made or held as a slave, or sent out of the country to be so made or held, or shall in any way knowingly aid in causing any other person to be held, sold, or carried away, to be held or sold as a slave, he or she shall be punished, on conviction, by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both.

If the master or owners, or person having charge of any vessel, shall receive on board any other person, whether negro, mulatto, or otherwise, with the knowledge or intent that such person shall be carried from any State, Territory, or district of the United States, to a foreign country, State, or place, to be held or sold as a slave, or shall carry away from any State, Territory, or district of the United States, any such person, with the intent that he or she shall be so held or sold as a slave, such master, owner, or other person offending, is to be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 nor less than $500, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both. And the vessel on board which the person was received to be carried away is to be forfeited to the United States.

Mr. CLARK. I desire simply to say that this bill is reported from the Judiciary Committee upon a resolution introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts. It seemed to the committee that there was a necessity for the passage of a bill of this kind, and it has been thoroughly considered by that committee.

Mr. SUMNER. As I understand it, then, the bill grows out of those outrages, of which we had a report, in the Gulf States—in Florida, in Mississippi, in Louisiana, and Texas—where freedmen were seized and carried off and sold as slaves. Since I called the attention of the Senate to those outrages, I have received three or four other communications, which I have not with me now, for I did not anticipate that the bill would be called up to-day, all communicating additional evidence with regard to those outrages. They are going on now in Florida, and perhaps not unnaturally, because Florida is the nearest to Cuba; and they are also going on in Texas, and even in Louisiana. In this way the proclamation of emancipation is set at defiance, and a new slave trade is opened. I am very grateful to the Committee on the Judiciary for the promptitude with which they have reported this remedial measure, and I hope the Senate will pass it.

Mr. CLARK. I have said that the attention of the committee was called to this subject by the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. So I understood the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. And by reports in the newspapers and from other quarters that this traffic was carried on, and on an examination we found no sufficient protection in the statutes of the United States against it. There was some slight protection in the statute which regulated the coastwise slave trade, but that was repealed at the last session, and the committee could find no suitable provision, in fact no provision at all, on the statutes that would apply to this matter, and they therefore report this bill. They have no particular evidence as to how extensively this trade has been carried on, or what are the particular necessities for this measure, but there are reports of the kind that have been suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, and I think the Senate will see that there ought to be such a bill to guard against any danger that there may be in this way.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

F. A. PATTERSON.

Mr. CLARK. I ask the Senate now to proceed to the consideration of a little bill for the relief of a Mr. Patterson, formerly an officer of the Army.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 117) for the relief of F. A. Patterson, late captain of the third Virginia cavalry, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to pay Captain F. A. Patterson the full amount of pay and emoluments as a captain of the third Virginia cavalry, from the 24th of November, 1862, the date of his commission by the Governor of Virginia, to the date of the muster out of his regiment.

Mr. GRIMES. What is that bill?

Mr. CLARK. I am inquired of by the Senator nearest me what this bill is, or what it means. Captain Patterson was commissioned by Governor Peirpoint, of the State of Virginia, to raise a regiment of cavalry for the Union Army. He proceeded to raise his regiment and repaired to Winchester, where he supposed he would be mustered in, but found no mustering officer there, and was very soon after taken prisoner with Milroy's command and carried to a rebel prison and kept there twenty-two months, and was unable to get any pay whatever. The committee think he should be paid. It was not his fault that he was not mustered, but the fault of the Government.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST ROADS.

Mr. DIXON. I now move that the Senate proceed to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 61) to establish certain post roads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to these amendments, reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. DIXON. I propose to amend the amendments in line thirty, page 7, under the head of "Kansas," by striking out the words, "From Emporia, via Neosho Rapids," and inserting, "Enterprise, via Ottumwa."

Mr. CLARK. That is an amendment in the third degree, and can only be made by unanimous consent. Probably there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be considered as made by unanimous consent if there be no objection. It is an amendment in the third degree and not strictly in order.

Mr. DIXON. There are some routes that have been omitted by the committee that I now propose to add. On page 7, after line thirty-two, under the head of "Kansas," I move to add, "From Council Grove to Marion Center."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. DIXON. On page 8, after line fifty-six, under the head of "Iowa," I move to insert, "From Postville, via Lybrand and Ludlow, to Waukon, in Alamakee county."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent that amendment will be made.

Mr. DIXON. At the end of the amendment reported by the committee I move to insert,

"Michigan: From Coopersville, via Mansfield Mills, Ravenna, Slocum's Grove, Whitney's Mills, and Moreland, to Squier's Ferry."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made if there be no objection. The question is now on agreeing to the amendments reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to the amendments of the House.

The amendments to the amendments were agreed to.

The amendments of the House of Representatives, as amended, were concurred in.

LAND TITLES IN SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 93.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 93) to quiet the title to certain lands within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco.

It proposes to relinquish and grant all the right and title of the United States to the land situated within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco, in the State of California, confirmed to the city of San Francisco by the decree of the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of California, entered on the 18th of May, 1865, to the city of San Francisco and its successors, and to confirm the claim of the city to the land, subject, however, to the reservations and exceptions designated in that decree, and upon the following trusts, namely, that all the land, not heretofore granted to the city, shall be disposed of and conveyed by the city to parties in its bona fide actual possession, by themselves or tenants, on the passage of this bill, in such quantities and upon such terms and conditions as the Legislature of the State of California may prescribe, except such parcels as may be reserved and set apart by ordinance of the city for public uses; but the relinquishment and grant by this bill is not to interfere with or prejudice any valid adverse right or claim, if such exist, to the land or any part of it, whether derived from Spain, Mexico, or the United States, or preclude its judicial examination and adjustment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 96) authorizing an increase of the clerical force in the Post Office Department; which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 15, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BORTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

POSTAGE STAMPS AND STAMPED ENVELOPES.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be the consideration of House bill No. 299, relative to the sale of postage stamps and stamped envelopes on credit, reported yesterday from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has the morning hour commenced?

The SPEAKER. It has. The bill was ordered to be printed yesterday, but has not yet reached the House.

WAR DEBT OF THE SEVERAL STATES.

Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the State of Ohio, relative to the assumption by the General Government of the war debt of the several States; which were referred to the select committee on the war debt of the loyal States, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPALDING asked that the resolutions be read in extenso.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, objected, and called for the regular order of business.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KASSON. Is it in order, Mr. Speaker, to introduce a bill from the Committee on Appropriations for the purpose of having it printed?

The SPEAKER. It is in order at any time.

Mr. KASSON. Then I report the following bill from that committee: a bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1867, and for other purposes. And I move that it be printed and made the special order for this day week after the morning hour.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to ask whether there is anything in this bill in the shape of legislation? If there is, I shall have to raise a question of order.

Mr. KASSON. I will simply say, to avoid any question about it, that in the last section, in compliance with the request of the Postmaster General, he has the privilege of transmitting the mails by sailing vessels where it is necessary.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will reserve the right to make the point of order when the bill is reached in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be considered as read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole, to come up this day week after the morning hour until disposed of.

Mr. GARFIELD. I want to withdraw some papers before the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I insist upon the regular order. I have been trying for two weeks to get some resolutions in, and I want to get the opportunity as soon as possible.

POSTAGE STAMPS AND STAMPED ENVELOPES.

The House proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 299, relative to the sale of postage stamps and stamped envelopes on credit, on which Mr. ALLEY was entitled to the floor.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to make a motion to strike out all after the first section, and let the bill stand on the first section, simply as a matter of business management of the affairs of the Department in that respect.

Mr. ALLEY. I would like to know how the bill will stand then.

Mr. KASSON. Let the first section be reported.

The Clerk read the first section, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized, whenever in his opinion the public service shall require, until the 30th day of June, 1893, to deposit postage stamps and stamped envelopes with such persons as he may select, for sale. The persons with whom stamps and stamped envelopes are so deposited shall engage to sell and circulate the same, under the instructions of the Postmaster General, and shall give bond in such sum as the Postmaster General may direct, with one or more sureties, conditioned for the faithful keeping of the stamps and stamped envelopes so intrusted to them, and for the payment to the Post Office Department, in such manner as directed by the Postmaster General, of the moneys arising from the sale thereof.

Mr. KASSON. With the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ALLEY,] I will state that as far back as 1861, and subsequently, it was found desirable to increase the facilities for the purchase of stamps in all the large cities. It was and is still desirable to authorize depositories for the purpose of sale where they can be easily obtained in each ward, and perhaps in a dozen places in each ward of a city. So far as this bill will accomplish that result without cost to the Department I cannot see that there can be any objection to the adoption of that habit of business. But this remaining section which makes it in the nature of a public office and allows compensation for it is the one that I object to. There are parties in every part of the country, traders and shopkeepers, who would gladly have their offices made places of deposit and sale of stamps and envelopes without charge to the Department, because of the flow of custom it would naturally bring in. That we know to be the fact, and for that reason I propose the amendment.

Mr. ALLEY. I do not think that the amendment which the gentleman proposes will improve the bill. Neither do I think it is desired by the Department. For one I should be entirely opposed to it. The object of this bill is simply to provide means by which the people of the South, who are unable to enjoy the usual postal facilities, can secure stamps, instead of being compelled, as they now are, in a great many instances that have come to the knowledge of the Department, to purchase at great inconvenience and trouble, and pay, as they frequently have done, from twenty to twenty-five cents for a stamp.

To my surprise this bill encountered considerable opposition on yesterday, and for the simple reason, I believe, that the bill was not properly understood. This is a bill merely for business purposes. It is intended to increase the revenues of the Post Office Department, and in my opinion will do no harm to any interest of the Government, or to any individual in any section of the country. On the contrary, this bill is made in the interests of the Government, of freedom, and humanity. If I believed otherwise, I certainly would not advocate it.

There is no man upon this floor who appreciates more fully than I do the danger arising from the moral effect of any legislation which may have a tendency to bring back into these Halls men who have done their utmost to destroy this Government, and who stand in such a position that in my judgment the Government ought not to trust them with the power that will be conferred upon them by their admission here. No man will go further than I will in that respect.

But I am willing to grant all needful facilities so far as we can with safety to the Government to promote the interests of the great mass of the people of the South. I feel no disposition to gratify any feelings of revenge or hostility to that people as a body. I feel that they have suffered everything that a people ought to suffer for their transgressions. I think their terrible and unfortunate condition challenges the sympathy and pity of all mankind. Yet, while I cherish no other feelings than those of kindness and commiseration toward the great mass of the people of the South, I do feel that those men who have led that people into rebellion, the leaders of the rebellion, deserve and ought to suffer all the torments of the damned. [Cries of "Good!" "That is right!"] And so far as this bill is concerned, those individuals will receive but little benefit from it.

It is the great mass of the people, including the Union people of the South, who will be benefited by the provisions of this bill. And as this bill is framed in the interests of the Government, and intended to grant additional facilities in the way of mail service to the great mass of the people, I think it ought not to meet with any opposition.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] allow me to correct one misapprehension which I think he has fallen into in regard to the effect of my amendment?

Mr. ALLEY. Certainly.

Mr. KASSON. The proposed amendment accomplishes all the objects in the South which the gentleman himself desires except the one to pay the depositories a percentage on their sales. The amendment applies equally to the North and the South, and enables the Postmaster General to make deposits of stamps and take security for them as he may consider necessary and proper. If there be any neighborhood that has no public officer that will take that much trouble to accommodate the neighborhood, I do not think they ought to have this facility afforded them. And the amendment accomplishes the whole object of the gentleman except so far as relates to the allowance of five per cent. to the depositories upon the amount of their sales.

Mr. ALLEY. I did not misapprehend the gentleman at all, nor the force of the amendment, and I say that, so far as his object is concerned, in my opinion it is unnecessary, and is not required by the Department, and I have never heard that any section in the North is not now sufficiently accommodated.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] tell the House why it is proposed to allow a commission of five per cent. for selling these stamps? It would be a better business than coming to Congress.

Mr. ALLEY. The bill provides that five per cent. shall be allowed upon these stamps; but the allowance is confined to the sales in those localities and by those individuals designated by the Postmaster General under this bill, and where stamps cannot be obtained in the usual mode, and it is not intended to apply anywhere else.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to know exactly what this bill means. Is it not intended to give to men in the South who cannot take the oath an opportunity of selling these stamps, and giving them five per cent. for selling, because they cannot find postmasters out there to do the business who can take the oath?

Mr. ALLEY. The whole object of the bill, as I have stated over and over again, is to give the people of the South those mail facilities which they do not have now, and which they cannot have now for the reason the gentleman suggests. There is no disguise about that. I have stated to the House, and I state to the country, that this bill is not intended to provide for any one outside of the rebel States.

Now, I say for one, radical as I am, opposed as I am to the South coming back into these Halls as they desire to do, opposed as I am to that course of policy, yet so far as this bill is concerned I am for it, and for the very reason that it gives these people additional facilities that they cannot have now, the whole people, the great mass of the people, and it does nobody any harm. As I said before, I believe it is framed in the interest of the Government, in the interest of freedom, and in the interest of humanity, and no narrow-minded considerations shall deter me from its support.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Will my colleague inform me why the people of the South have not these mail privileges which this bill proposes to give them?

Mr. ALLEY. I have stated over and over again that the South have not these mail privileges because the Postmaster General is unable to find postmasters down there who can take the oath of office, or will take the oath of office and accept these offices.

Now, it will be understood, and I want the House to mark the fact, that the law requires that every postmaster shall live within the delivery district where the post office is established. Under that law it is impossible to send anybody down there from the North. They must be appointed from the districts in which they reside. Now, all over the South there were before the war little isolated post offices in the country that pay little or nothing, and it is really a favor to the Government for the incumbents to take these little offices. These are the reasons, and the chief reasons, why men will not take the oath of office. In that region there are few who can take the oath of office, and in many cases no one can be found willing to take upon themselves the responsibilities of postmasters, because the pecuniary consideration is so small. That is one of the chief reasons why it is so difficult to obtain loyal postmasters.

Mr. KELLEY. I interrupt the gentleman most unwillingly, but I feel it my duty, in behalf of the loyal people of the South, to say to him that I think he is most grievously misinformed; that there are loyal men in every district who would most gladly take any small office or emolument from this Government if public sentiment around them would permit or the Government would protect them in the exercise of their functions.

Mr. KASSON. Can they read and write?

Mr. KELLEY. Ay, they can read and write. I will mention one, whose letter communicating certain facts to the Government I had, who was elected to Congress by the few loyal men in his district, and who rallied the first regiment of loyal North Carolinians and fought through the whole war.

Night before last I had a visit from a soldier who fled from Texas into New Orleans as soon as our flag could protect him there, and who fought under Butler and Banks, and carries an honorable scar, and who has written a very clever book.

Mr. ALLEY. I really cannot yield any further.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KELLEY. I will answer any inquiry if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] will yield.

Mr. DAWES. I am also personally acquainted with the loyal North Carolinian to whom the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers, and I agree with everything he says in respect to him; that he was chosen by the loyal men of his district to represent that district in this Congress; that he fought at the head of his regiment during the whole war; that he came on here to find some recognition of the difference between him and the rebels in North Carolina at the hands of the loyal men of this Congress. And the inquiry I wish to make of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is, whether officially, as a Representative in Congress, he has made any distinction between him and rebels from North Carolina.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir; yes, sir; but I have not made that distinction which would require me to prostrate the Constitution of my country or to prostitute my office.

Mr. DAWES. What is the official distinction he has made?

Mr. ALLEY. I must decline to yield further. I yielded for a question, and not for a general discussion.

Now, a single word in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I do not know how it may be in regard to the statement which he has made; I presume it is so in the case to which he alludes; I am willing to take his word for it. I only know this, that as chairman of the Post Office Committee I have received innumerable letters from all parts of the South, from loyal men, judging from the expressions of sentiment in their letters, imploring Congress to take some action in this matter, to grant them additional facilities. In two or three instances I have received letters from the South, from men whom I have known in former years, who are as radical and as strongly Union as the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself, and they implored Congress to do something toward granting them additional mail facilities.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it was desired by the House last evening that this bill should be printed that they might have it before them, to reflect upon it, and look into it, and as it has but just come from the printer, and no opportunity has been given for its examination, if it is the wish of the House I am willing that it shall be postponed to a future day.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where we can discuss and amend it section by section.

Mr. KASSON. I hope, before the gentleman calls the previous question, he will allow an amendment to come in. I think we can vote on it now. It consists of only one section.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will let the bill go over for debate in some form. I want to vindicate the really loyal men of the South against the aspersions which he has cast upon them for the want of proper information. I know he would not do them wrong for the world.

Mr. DAWES. I hope my colleague will give the gentleman from Pennsylvania that opportunity.

Mr. KUYKENDALL. I think we may as well decide the matter now as at any other time.

Mr. ALLEY. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until this day fortnight.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The motion to postpone takes precedence of the motion to refer.

Mr. ALLEY. I demand the previous question on my motion.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If that motion shall be voted down, will not a motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be in order?

The SPEAKER. It will be. The previous question exhausts itself on the motion to postpone.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. FINCK. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 30, nays 108, not voting 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baker, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Broomall, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Deming, Donnelly, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, William Lawrence, Loan, McClurg, McKee, Orth, Paine, William H. Randall, Schenck, Scofield, Sloan, Spaulding, Stevens, Van Aernam, Elihu B. Washburne, Williams, and James F. Wilson—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Baldwin, Baxter, Bergen, Bidwell, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Buckland, Chanler, Cobb, Conkling, Callom, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, DeGreese, Delano, Briggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Good-year, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jencks, Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Marvin, McCullough, McLean, Miller, Morris, Niblack, Radford, O'Neill, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Pomroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Rollins, Rousseau, Sawyer, Shanklin, Shellbarger, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trumble, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—108.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Barker, Bingham, Blow, Brandegee, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Culver, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Farnsworth, Garfield, Edwin N. Hubbard, Jones, Kelso, Longyear, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, McIndoe, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Noell, Patterson, Plants, Price, Ross, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Francis Thomas, Voorhees, Ward, Warner, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—44.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The question then recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question on the motion to postpone the bill till Thursday, March 1, after the morning hour.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion to postpone was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 98) entitled "An act to incorporate the Metropolitan Fire and Marine Insurance Company of the District of Columbia;"

A bill (S. No. 115) entitled "An act for the relief of Jane W. Nethaway;" and

A bill (S. No. 85) entitled "An act granting to the State of Wisconsin a donation of public lands to aid in the construction of a breakwater and harbor and ship-canal at the head of Sturgeon bay, in the county of Door, in said State, to connect the waters of Green bay with Lake Michigan, in said State."

AMENDMENT OF POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. ALLEY reported, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, a bill to amend the postal laws; which was read a first and second time.

The question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time,

The Clerk commenced to read the bill in extenso, but was interrupted by Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, who said: Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire whether this bill has been printed.

The SPEAKER. It has not been.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] that he had better allow the bill to be postponed until it can be printed.

Mr. ALLEY. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will move that the bill be printed, and that it be postponed, like the other bill, until Thursday, March 1.

The SPEAKER. I suppose the gentleman understands that if the bill be postponed until that day it may not be reached then, nor until some time after.

Mr. ALLEY. Then let it be made a special order.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is necessary to make it a special order. There are now two special orders after the morning hour—the bankrupt bill and the loan bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object to this bill being made a special order.

Mr. ALLEY. If the House will agree to fix some other time for the consideration of the bill, I am perfectly willing; but if gentlemen desire to push the bill aside, with no definite time fixed for its consideration, I cannot, of course, consent.

Mr. LE BLOND. I see that the bill proposes several very important changes in the postal laws; and I suggest to the chairman of the committee [Mr. ALLEY] that the bill be ordered to be printed, and then be recommitted, so that it can again be brought before the House whenever reports from this committee shall be in order.

Mr. ALLEY. The bill does propose several important changes in the law; but it is a bill which I think will encounter no opposition. I am perfectly willing to have it printed; indeed I desire that it shall be printed and that the House shall act understandingly upon it. I am willing to give all the opportunity for examination and discussion that anybody can desire; but I am not willing that the bill shall be pushed aside in such a way that it cannot be brought up again.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to my colleague that he allow the bill to be recommitted, and then enter a motion to reconsider, which he can call up hereafter.

Mr. ALLEY. I cannot believe that there will be any opposition to the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, it is utterly impossible for members of this House to understand the provisions of a bill like this, consisting of many sections, unless it be before us in print; and I give notice to the gentleman that though I may stand alone, I will vote against every bill of a complicated character which is brought in in this way, and attempted to be forced through without a proper opportunity for examination by members of the House. I do not understand that the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads desires to force this bill through in that manner. Certainly he will allow the House some opportunity to know what we are legislating about; otherwise our measures cease to be the legislation of the House, and become the legislation of the committee alone.

Mr. ALLEY. It is what I want to do.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is all we ask. It has been suggested by my colleague over the way that the gentleman move the bill be printed and recommitted. He can have an opportunity of reporting it at any future time, when the House will have the bill before it, and an opportunity of knowing what are its provisions and voting understandingly on it. I hope he will take some such course as that, and not force us to vote upon a bill of such a complicated character before we know what it is.

Mr. ALLEY. I agree entirely with the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio. I think he is perfectly right; and I am the last man who would compel the House to vote on a bill of this character without proper consideration. I move that the bill be recommitted and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEY. I ask now to have entered a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. It will be entered upon the Journal.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take up for consideration House bill No. 86, making additional appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1866, and for other purposes. It is an important bill, and the appropriations are much needed.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated the first reading of the bill for information would be dispensed with, if there were no objection.

Mr. BROOKS. I object until we can know what the bill is.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. BROOKS. I withdraw my objection to the first reading of the bill for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will now be read by clauses, for amendment.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Survey of the coast:

For the survey of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts of the United States, including compensation of civilians engaged in the work, and excluding pay and emoluments of officers of the Army and Navy and petty officers and men of the Navy employed in the work, $120,000.

Mr. BROOKS. I observe this bill is for additional appropriations, or what, in other words, is called a deficiency bill. I rise to say that, in my opinion, under the present heavy taxation of the people, our appropriations for the coast survey ought to be as few as possible, consistent with the interests of commerce. I should like to hear from the chairman of the committee whether it is not consistent with the public interest to make further reductions than is here made.

Mr. STEVENS. The committee will find this was an appropriation for 1866. We made no appropriation last year. This bill failed between the two Houses, and the department has been carried on on the faith of this having passed both Houses and having only failed in consequence of an amendment, we all understand, moved by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Davis.) It is the same we passed last year and which failed, and is no new appropriation.

Mr. BROOKS. The explanation is satisfactory.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For continuing the survey of the reefs, shoals, and keys of South Florida, including compensation of civilians engaged in the work, and excluding pay and emoluments of the officers of the Army and Navy and petty officers and men of the Navy employed in the work, $11,000.

Mr. DARLING. I move to strike that out.

Mr. STEVENS. Although we do not need a navy-yard there, yet our ships sail along that coast, and it is a dangerous coast, and of all others needs surveying.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If New York does not need this let us know it.

Mr. STEVENS. I make the point of order that the committee had passed away from the paragraph, and the amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules the amendment out.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For mates' and seamen's wages, repairs, supplies, and incidental expenses of forty-three light-vessels, $230,917 75.

Mr. DARLING. I move to strike out the last three words "seventy-five cents."

Mr. Chairman, I would like to know from the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether this provides for light-house keepers in the southern States; and if so, whether they are required to take the oath of allegiance before they are inducted into office.

Mr. STEVENS. This bill was provided before the war ended. It is not based upon any appropriation for the southern States except in a few instances.

Mr. DARLING withdrew his amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rebuilding outer-range light at Cedar Point, Sandusky bay, Ohio, $10,000.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty."

Since this bill was reported, the principal engineer of the Light-House Bureau has come to me and satisfied me we have made a mistake in reference to the estimate; that the estimate was for $20,000 instead of $10,000; and that the former sum is imperatively necessary.

Mr. STEVENS. I have not been able to hear the gentleman.

Mr. SPALDING. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that since this bill was reported, the engineer of the Light-House Bureau has come to me and stated that there is a mistake in the estimate; that the original estimate was $20,000 instead of $10,000; and that the board wish it restored to $20,000, because their estimate shows that the light-house cannot be built for less than that sum.

Mr. STEVENS. Will my colleague on the committee turn to the estimate?

Mr. SPALDING. I cannot do it. I only rely on the statement of the engineer, Mr. Poe, that he was specially directed by Admiral Shubrick to have this correction made.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no doubt that what the gentleman states is correct, but I do not know where to find the justification of an increase on the record.

Mr. SPALDING. The mistake may have been in the manuscript that was sent to the printer. He says it was made $20,000 and not $10,000.

Mr. STEVENS. I leave it to the House. I only say that the committee would not feel justified in agreeing to that, because we have no record which requires more than $10,000.

Mr. DAVIS. I beg leave to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio to amend so that the appropriation shall be $20,000, or so much thereof as shall be necessary.

Mr. SPALDING. I accept that modification. I do not want any more than is necessary.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was agreed to.

Mr. SLOAN. I move to strike out lines one hundred and eighty and one hundred and eighty-one, as follows:

For completion of the Dubuque, Iowa, custom-house, $15,000.

I would inquire of the chairman of the committee if there is any necessity for building such houses?

Mr. KASSON. The custom-house is just about completed, so far that it is now occupied not merely for a custom-house, but for a post office and court-room. And this was the estimate made last year and accepted by both branches of Congress for the purpose of completing the roof and details of the building, to make it comfortable for all the branches of the Government.

Mr. STEVENS. I am bound to say that since this estimate was made last year the Secretary has written us a letter, in which he asks that we appropriate at least $5,000 more for the purpose of completing all that work. I move, therefore, to make it $20,000 instead of $15,000.

Mr. SLOAN. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. If there is any objection to it I withdraw it.

Mr. SLOAN. It seems to be conceded that there is no need whatever for a custom-house there. There are no foreign goods entered there, I believe; and if that is so, this appropriation for a custom-house evidently should be stricken out of the bill. If it is proper to make an appropriation for completing the post office in the city of Dubuque, that proposition ought to be presented to the House and voted upon. If it is the policy of the Government to erect post office buildings at places of the size of Dubuque, there are many other towns equal to Dubuque, some in my own State, that would like appropriations for the same purpose.

Mr. STEVENS. This building is very nearly completed. It has been in progress some time, and it embraces both custom-house and post office.

Mr. SLOAN. In answer to the chairman of the committee I will say that if there is no need whatever of a custom-house at Dubuque a clause should be reported authorizing the Government to sell the building and putting the money into the Treasury, instead of making further appropriations for the completion of a building which it is conceded that the Government has no earthly use for, at least for the purpose for which this appropriation is to be made. And I take it to be very doubtful policy for the Government to complete these buildings for the purpose of post offices. It is establishing a principle which will become very expensive, if carried out, and we build post offices in every town in the country of the size of Dubuque.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If this were a new proposition to build a custom-house, I should be decidedly opposed to it, as I believe the Committee on Commerce of the House has reported against all of these propositions. But this is a building which has already been erected, not only for a custom-house, of which there is not much need, but also for a post office and a United States court, as I understand. Fifteen thousand dollars were asked for at the last session of Congress to complete this building. I suppose that that will be a sufficient sum, and I trust it will be found sufficient. I merely rose to move as an amendment to add after the words "custom-house" the words "post office and United States court-room."

Mr. ALLISON. In answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. SLOAN,] I will say that this building is almost completed as a post office, and saves the Government an annual rent of at least fifteen hundred dollars for that purpose. The United States court for the northern district of Iowa is held at Dubuque, and the court-room is in this building. The office of the clerk of the district court is also in this building, and there is room for the office of the surveyor general. There will thus be a saving to the Government of a large amount of money annually in the way of rents; and this appropriation is certainly necessary now to complete the building, which has cost the Government at least one hundred and fifty thousand dollars in former years. I think it would be very unwise policy to undertake to sell the building, as proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin. If that policy is undertaken, we might extend it to other cities, a little larger perhaps than Dubuque, yet having no more use for this class of public buildings.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw my amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and it was agreed to.

The question was then taken on Mr. SLOAN's motion to strike out the entire clause; and it was disagreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to strike out the following clause:

For payment of claims due for the constructing and furnishing the Baltimore court-house, $100,000.

I desire some information in regard to this item. It is a very large sum, and I should like to know what part of the appropriation is for constructing the Baltimore court-house, and what proportion is for furnishing it. I have understood that the furniture placed in that court-house has been of a most extravagant character, and cost a very large sum. I hope we shall have some information on the subject.

Mr. STEVENS. I think the estimates do not separate the items, and therefore I am entirely unable to give the information the gentleman seeks. They are clubbed together in the estimates.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think the committee ought to have some information in regard to what the contract price was for the building and furnishing of this court-house, how it was built, and how this demand comes here. I do not understand it at all. We are asked to appropriate $100,000 on very meager information.

Mr. STEVENS. This is the amount that was due at the time this appropriation was called for during the last Congress. This sum was actually due under contracts made before that time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think my friend from Pennsylvania is mistaken in regard to this bill, because there are certainly some items in this bill that were not in the bill of the last Congress.

Mr. STEVENS. This appropriation is for an amount that was due last year. This is one of the items of the old bill. It is to carry out contracts made under a former law.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think we had better strike it out and let it go to the Senate. We may be able to get more information on the subject there.

I will withdraw my amendment, however, and merely say one word in regard to the furnishing of this court-house. I was told at the Interior Department that they went on, without any authority of law whatever, and furnished the court-house in a most extravagant manner, and the Interior Department refused to pay for it; and now they come here and ask for this very large sum of money.

Mr. J. L. THOMAS. I do not know anything about the particular items in this appropriation. I know, however, one thing, that most of those articles that were furnished for the construction of the new court-house in Baltimore were furnished by men in New York and in the eastern States. I do not think any citizens of Baltimore have any interest in this appropriation.

The contractor for building the court-house was a man, I think, from Brooklyn, in the State of New York—a man who I understand has built court-houses elsewhere, and who is a man of great integrity and honesty. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] that there was perhaps a great deal of useless expense in relation to the inside work of that court-room; but the court-house was accepted by the Interior Department as constructed by the man with whom the contract was made by the Government. At least that is my understanding of it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What was the expense of the furniture for furnishing that Baltimore court-house?

Mr. J. L. THOMAS. I do not know. I have stated that I did not know anything about any of the items which go to make up this appropriation; and I did not know until I was just now called upon that this appropriation was in the deficiency bill. I do not know what are the items that go to make up this appropriation, nor who were the contractors. I suppose that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. STEVENS] can inform the House what are the items that go to make up this gross amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] proposes to withdraw his amendment.

Objection was made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I must ask a new count.

The CHAIRMAN. As there has been some debate since the last count was taken, the Chair will regard the question upon striking out the appropriation for the Baltimore court-house as one just offered and open to debate.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to say that I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] is mistaken in regard to the Department of the Interior. That Department has recommended, as will be found on page 6 of the estimates, this very appropriation, and ask it to be made in order to enable them to pay a debt contracted.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Did the Department expend this money without the authority of law and without any appropriation?

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir; authority was given, and a contract was made under that authority: and this is the amount due under that contract.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. And no appropriation has been made to pay the contract?

Mr. STEVENS. No appropriation has been made to finish it.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Does the Department have discretionary power to make such a court-house as they please?

Mr. STEVENS. The Department report to us that the contract was made and executed; and this is the amount due on that contract.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. How was the Department authorized to make the contract?

Mr. STEVENS. By an old law.

Mr. HILL. I desire to ascertain from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. STEVENS] whether this court-house was built and the furniture supplied under a contract? I did not distinctly understand whether the contract to which he referred embraced both the building and the furniture, or whether the building was erected under a contract, and the furniture supplied without a contract.

Mr. STEVENS. We have no information except what we get from the Department. The Department informs us that this amount is due from the Government to the contractors, and we have reported it accordingly. Whether the appropriation shall be made or not is for the House to determine.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am not mistaken as to what the Assistant Secretary of the Interior told me in regard to this very appropriation; that they went on without any authority of law whatever and bought this furniture, and the Department refused to pay for it; they had no fund out of which to pay for it. What I protest against here, and always protest against, is the contracting of debts by a Department or by any one in the name of the Government without any authority of law. It is very true that the Interior Department has recommended us to pay this; but it is in our discretion whether we will sanction this sort of thing. I am opposed to it.

Mr. HILL. I am decidedly in favor of carrying out strictly and religiously all the contracts of the Government. But if any part of this expenditure has not been incurred pursuant to a contract entered into by the Government, I think that it is but right that the House should know what are the circumstances under which the indebtedness has arisen, before appropriating this large amount of money. For that reason I think the amendment is a proper one.

Mr. J. L. THOMAS. I will state for the information of this House, that this court-house has not only been built and all this furniture placed in it, but for some months past it has been used by the United States Government for the United States district and circuit courts. The lower floor is furnished for the use of the United States marshals and the United States district attorneys, together with all the other offices of the United States, with the exception of the post office and the custom-house, in that district.

Now, it appears to me, that inasmuch as the Secretary of the Interior has accepted this court-house with all the furniture and appurtenances therein, according to the contract, it is nothing more than right that the contractor should be paid. The citizens of Baltimore are not particularly interested in this, for we have our court-house built and all the furniture in it. The only question now is about paying for it.

Mr. HILL. I understand from the gentleman that he regards it as a correct principle that the Secretary of the Interior may, by the acceptance of any work or material, bind Congress to pay for it. I desire to know whether I am correct in my understanding.

Mr. J. L. THOMAS. No, sir; the gentleman has not understood me correctly. What I mean to say is this: that where the Secretary of the Interior, or any other officer of the Government as high in position as he is, accepts a contract, the presumption here is that everything done by him has been done in strict accordance with law. I do not go behind the acts of the Secretary of the Interior or any other officer of this Government occupying as high an official position as he does. If the Secretary of the Interior accepted that court-house, as the chairman of the committee states, it is presumable that he did not accept it contrary to the provisions of existing law, or contrary to the contract which was entered into at the time that the court-house was built. Now, somebody must be paid for the work which has been done. The court-house has been built; and, according to my information, as I have stated, not only was it built by men from the North, but the furniture was provided by them. I maintain that these men ought to be paid.

Mr. HILL. I think that I was correct in my understanding of the gentleman's views. At all events, I differ from him in this: I deny that an officer of this Government, whether high or low, can appropriate funds from the Treasury without authority of law. I approve of the time-honored principle that appropriations of money should be made by Congress, the legislative department of the Government, not by the executive or any other department. Hence I insist that the fact that the Secretary of the Interior or any other officer has accepted certain materials or certain work, does not impose upon Congress any sort of obligation to pay one dollar of the expense incurred, unless it has been incurred in pursuance of law.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HILL] a question. Suppose that some person should furnish him a horse, for which he did not contract, but which he accepted and used and kept, would he not consider himself bound to pay for it?

Mr. HILL. If I accepted it and used it I should doubtless consider myself bound as an individual to pay for it. But the point which I make is that the Secretary of the Interior has no authority to bind Congress by contracting without the authority of Congress, if that is the case, for any material or work or anything of the kind.

Mr. KASSON. I simply wish to state what I understand to be the position of this case.

The construction of this court-house was authorized by law. Appropriations were made in the usual way for its construction and for furnishing it. Those appropriations have proved insufficient. The work is done; the property is being used and worn out, so far as it is personal property, by the Government. The Secretary of the Interior, the only responsible party whom we know, has adjusted these claims, with the aid of the proper accounting officer, and he reports them now to Congress as amounting to this sum.

The only ground of the opposition to the present appropriation is that the gentleman from Illinois says that a subordinate officer of the Department, in personal conversation with him, has stated that the property (referring, as I understand, only to the furniture,) was contracted for without the prior direction of the Secretary of the Interior. We have no letter; we have no report; we have simply the statement of one of our colleagues, resting upon the statement, not in writing, of another man, and he a subordinate in the Department; and we are asked to accept this, in opposition to the express declaration of the head of the Department that the United States owes this much money for property which it is now using. If this committee should permit the unauthenticated statements—of course I intend no impeachment of the verbal statements of anybody; I mean officially unauthenticated statements, to override officially authenticated statements, it would be of course a rather bad precedent to adopt.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] what officially authenticated statement he has from the Secretary of the Interior in regard to this matter, except a statement of the gross amount which is due. I undertake to say that if the consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow, I will produce the evidence to support every statement that I have made, and to show that this appropriation is without authority of law.

Mr. KASSON. I want to vindicate my statement. The authority is the same upon which we make up all the bills which are made up by order of the House in the committee, the official authenticated reports of the proper Departments, concentrated at the Treasury Department, and reported in conformity to law to this department, and perfectly responsible in every particular. Among them is found an item for the payment of claims for furnishing and for the construction of the Baltimore post office building. It is thus authenticated to the committee, the amount given showing its adjustment, and is recommended officially and regularly to us.

Personally I do not care what the committee does with it. I should be glad, however, if the House would act upon a rule which could be relied upon.

Mr. HILL. I desire to answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] which I did not have an opportunity to do before. I understood the gentleman to ask me whether, if a horse should be put in my possession, and I should appropriate it to my own use, I would refuse to pay for it. Do I understand him correctly?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. While I very cheerfully answer that I should not refuse to pay for it, I desire to know whether he regards this as an analogous case.

Mr. STEVENS. I do.

Mr. HILL. I understand him to say, then, that the Secretary of the Interior has power, without authority of law, or pursuant to contract, by accepting and making use of property to bind Congress to pay for it. In this proposition, sir, I do not concur. I think there is no analogy between the case supposed in the gentleman's question and the case under consideration. In the case supposed, I would act as an individual, and upon my own responsibility, and would be liable as an individual. But the power of disbursing, as well as raising, revenue belongs to Congress, and I do not understand that the Secretary of the Interior has been constituted its agent, even. Hence no act of his in taking possession of property can bind Congress to pay for it, and the analogy cannot exist.

Mr. STEVENS. The United States authorities are now using the building.

Mr. HILL. Has the Secretary of the Interior the authority to bind Congress in this way? Such has not been my opinion, and therefore I have opposed this appropriation.

Mr. HALE. I beg leave to inquire whether, if the Secretary of the Interior has this authority to bind Congress, how many other officers of the Government have the same authority? Let us know how many agents of the Government have the right to bind Congress to pay whatever debts they may choose to incur.

Mr. STEVENS. There was a law authorizing the construction of this building, and partial appropriations have been made and expended. The contract is executed and this is for a deficiency.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him whether the law authorizing the contract also authorized the payment of more money than was appropriated?

Mr. STEVENS. We sometimes appropriate for the commencement of a work, sometimes for its continuation, and sometimes for its completion. Both branches of Congress made this appropriation at the last session, and it only failed on account of a difference on another subject.

Mr. J. L. THOMAS. I will state another fact. This contract was made before the war, and hence was made upon a gold basis; but in spite of the war, and in spite of the depreciation of our currency, the contractor went to work and fulfilled his contract. He has completed the building and furnished it, and the Government of the United States had possession of it six months ago. At the beginning of the war there was hardly anything done except that the foundation was built.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the name of the contractor?

Mr. J. L. THOMAS. The gentleman will find on inquiry at the Department of the Interior that the name of the contractor was Mr. Osborne, from Brooklyn, or Rochester, New York, I do not know which. The date of the contract I do not remember, but it was some time in 1858 or 1859, perhaps 1860. It was just before the breaking out of the war. I know the law was passed during the time J. Morrison Harris was a member of Congress from the city of Baltimore. The contract was entered into under the administration of Mr. Buchanan.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DRIGGS. I move to strike out the following:

For continuation of the north wing of the Treasury extension, $200,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order, as the paragraph has been passed. Each paragraph stands as a section for the purpose of amendment, and it is not in order to go back to a paragraph which has been passed.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For payment of claims due for the repair of Government warehouses and construction of wharves, Staten Island, New York, $29,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should like to have some information in regard to this item, as it is one of many I do not understand. I think this is extremely exceptionable. What is this indebtedness contracted for? I know persons representing the city of New York are here clamoring for new quarantine grounds.

Mr. DARLING. I think there was no provision made for the erection of a building for the storage of goods from infected vessels, and this is for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman will permit me, his hypothesis is contradicted by the very language of the paragraph itself:

For payment of claims due for the repair of Government warehouses, and construction of wharves, Staten Island, New York, $29,000.

What I protest against, is our voting away these large sums of money without any full explanation of them. Now, I would like to know by what authority these repairs were made, and what they were before I am called upon to vote for this appropriation. It seems they desire to give up all these works, and if so, before we appropriate this money I want to know what it is for.

Mr. DARLING. I suppose the Committee on Appropriations have investigated this matter, as it is a part of their duty to investigate all such matters before they come into the House with a report asking for appropriations. If they have not done their duty, then we are not prepared to vote upon their recommendations. But concluding that they have done their duty, I am prepared to vote for any appropriation asked for by the committee unless I have some personal knowledge that it would be wrong so to vote.

Mr. BERGEN. I think I can enlighten the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] in relation to these repairs at Staten Island. I have noticed a large number of shops built there for the purpose of storing cotton which the Government have captured and stored there. It is necessary to protect it from the weather and preserve it, and that I presume explains the repairs of the buildings. A fire occurred there some two or three years ago, and it may have become necessary to expend something on the wharves so as to enable them to land cotton and store it.

Mr. RADFORD. I rise to ask the chairman of the committee to give the reasons why this appropriation is asked. I think he can satisfy the House upon the subject. I would like the gentleman to state upon what the committee base their action.

Mr. STEVENS. It is impossible for me to hear what the gentleman inquires about, but I take it for granted it is in regard to the reason for this appropriation. If the gentleman from New York on my right, [Mr. DARLING,] had not so quickly interposed and delivered a short lecture in regard to the Committee on Appropriations I should have answered the inquiry before. I did rise to answer it, but inasmuch as the two gentlemen from New York [Mr. DARLING and Mr. TABER] have explained the matter so satisfactorily, I hardly thought it worth while to say a word. I will, however, as the gentleman from New York seems to suppose that a compliment to the committee was necessary, say a word.

The Government own warehouses at the place spoken of, and they own a wharf which was necessary for their use. It became necessary to repair them. Last year the Government asked an appropriation as a deficiency to make up for these repairs of warehouses already built and in use, and which were necessary for the Government use. The Committee on Appropriations last year, of which I was chairman, agreed without any difficulty that these buildings, having been repaired and the money being due, it ought to be paid. We have now repeated what has been passed, as I said before, by both Houses of Congress. The money not having been paid, and having remained a year longer unpaid than it would but for the unfortunate failure of that bill, which we all of us recollect, we now insert the appropriation in this bill. As a matter of course it is indifferent to the committee whether it is stricken out or not, except as we are bound to ask to have it paid, the Government being indebted for the repairs.

The question being taken on the amendment to strike out the item, it was not agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to strike out lines two hundred, two hundred and one, and two hundred and two, as follows:

For error in compensation of one messenger, at $1,000, and two assistants at $840 each, forty dollars.

The question being taken on striking out this item, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following clause:

For refurnishing and repairing President's House, $40,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inquire if we have not already passed a separate bill appropriating thirty or forty thousand dollars for this very purpose.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman is not mistaken. We have already appropriated $30,000 for furnishing the President's House. It is proper that I should say, under the circumstances, that heretofore the sum usually appropriated for furnishing the President's House upon the incoming of an Administration has been $20,000. There has always been a small deficiency, however. In Mr. Buchanan's time it was $4,000. In the case of Mr. Lincoln, owing to the dilapidations, it was something more, ten or fifteen thousand dollars. Then, in the last Congress, we voted $30,000, but the bill failed, and we have repeated the appropriation this year. But owing to the confusion that took place after the death of the President and the long-continued sickness of his wife, the house was left a prey to almost everybody that chose to go there, and it was found upon examination, when Mr. Johnson was about to take possession of the house, that scarcely anything was left, and that it required not only the $30,000, but upon a full estimate of what is wanted, made by the Commissioner of Public Buildings under the direction of the inmates of the house, it was found that to restore matters as they were and to add the usual ornaments and furniture, it will require $46,000 more. It was found, after the $30,000 were appropriated, that there had already been expended $42,000, and that the sum appropriated was not only absorbed, but some $12,000 more, and the house was still unfurnished. The servants and everybody had access to the house during the fatal period to which I have referred, for about six weeks, and I may say that it was open for anybody to plunder it that chose to go there. The result was that almost all the valuable furniture in the house was missing; and when the present President came in it was found necessary, even before he could be entertained with a single meal, that spoons should be bought in this city for the purpose of furnishing his table; that linen, sheets, bedding, and all those things were necessary, and even the beds themselves.

It was found that the house was in the custody of nobody. The steward who was there was responsible. But it was found that these goods had been taken everywhere. They were to be traced—I will not say among the employes; but they were gone; they were not to be found. It is enough for us to know that the things were not there, and it is due to the present President and his family to say that their estimates of what is needed have been made, in my judgment, on the most economical scale consistent with the dignity of the nation. We find that less than this sum will not suffice. There is some $15,000 unpaid after appropriating the whole of the $30,000. I trust that enough has been said to show to the House the necessity of this appropriation, and that it will be made without objection.

Mr. UPSON. I would inquire of the gentleman if there was no public officer whose duty it was to see that this property was protected?

Mr. STEVENS. There was a steward appointed by the late President, but it turned out that he was not a responsible person. He was appointed by Mr. Lincoln himself, and it was his duty to take care of the property.

The Committee on Appropriations, under these circumstances, have prepared a bill making the steward responsible to the Government, and requiring him to give such security as will prevent anything of this kind in the future.

Mr. NIBLACK. I would inquire if the missing spoons are the same that Mr. Ogle talked about a few years ago? [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, they are the same spoons. They are the gold spoons that were purchased, I think, by Mr. Van Buren, at great expense, and I may say that out of a large number of spoons, forks, and knives, which were very valuable, but one or two would be left out of two dozen; and all that has been done has been to furnish samples to the persons in New York who furnish these things, and they are being replaced, not to the extent that Mr. Van Buren had, but as nearly as the present humble and economical President deems necessary. I can say to the committee that nothing more is asked by the President and his family than is absolutely necessary to make the house decent.

Mr. UPSON. They left some for samples?

Mr. STEVENS. They left a sample or two, because they did not want to make them get an entirely different set. I have understood that some of these things are—well, it is no matter where they are.

No amendment being offered,

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, until the following clause was read:

For annual repairs of the Capitol, water-closets, public stables, water-pipes, pavements, and other walks within the Capitol square, broken glass and locks, and for the protection of the building, and keeping the main approaches to it unincumbered, in addition to old material sold, $8,000.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by inserting after the clause just read the following:

For removing the unsightly double railing or fence erected across the old Hall of the House of Representatives in the Capitol, $100.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman will modify his amendment so as to include "the monsters." [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I have been watching this bill carefully for some time, as it was read, in order to find an opportunity to offer this amendment. By a very general concurrence of sentiment in the last Congress an appropriation was made for the removal of that singular and strange structure across the old Hall of the House of Representatives. But in consequence of the failure of the miscellaneous appropriation bill of last session, or from some other cause, the appropriation failed. I propose to renew the proposition at this time, and in this Congress. It is not necessary that I should describe that which members here see every day.

The architect of this Capitol, whose acquaintance I have not the honor of enjoying, may be a man of exceedingly good taste, but if that be an indication of his capability and quality in that respect, then I have very much mistaken what constitutes good taste. There is a railing across that Hall, which, by previous legislation, had been appropriated as a gallery of statuary—a railing so clumsy, so rough, so high, that it seems in every sense to defeat the very object for which the old Hall, with all its former agreeable and sacred associations, was set apart.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the gentleman complain of the height of that railing?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do complain of the height. A man of ordinary stature like myself may be able to reach up and put his nose, or even his chin, on the top of the railing. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] may be able to do better than that; but he is taller than some of his peers. His colleague near me, [Mr. O'NEILL,] I think would have to look through the bars. The gentleman from Illinois, representing the Chicago district, [Mr. WESTWORTH,] no doubt can look entirely over it, and stand there and look with admiring sympathy upon the female form, his compeer in size at least, [laughter,] which is standing upon a pedestal there.

Mr. STEVENS. Is not that high railing necessary to keep that female from breaking out? [Loud laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has suggested that I modify my amendment so as to require the removal of the monster erected there, which, I suppose, is that female figure. I will leave him to move that amendment. But I will say that that, too, is an instance of no very great good taste upon the part of the architect, or the Commissioner of Public Buildings, who had that prototype of the colossal statue upon the top of the dome put there for public admiration, as passers come and go through that Hall.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman accept a modification of his amendment, so as to include "and other nuisances in that Hall?" There are quite a number of them there besides that fence.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to that being ordered. But for the present I wish to make a remark about "the monster," as it is termed. I do not propose to criticise anything about it except the absence of the cap of liberty on the head of that figure. I suppose gentlemen know very well that it was for the purpose of yielding to the prejudices of a certain Jefferson Davis that that was taken off and the helmet or crown put upon her head. But that statue, whatever it may have on its head, is certainly out of place there. I had supposed that every principle of art required that a colossal statue should be elevated a sufficient distance to make it have some appearance of natural size. But this strange creature is brought down to within the near vision of every passer-by, thus converting the statue of George Washington, on the other side of the Hall, into a mere Tom Thumb in comparison.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] yield to me that I may make a statement in vindication of certain parties?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I simply wish to say, in vindication of the present architect in charge of the Capitol, that he is not the gentleman who ordered that huge fence to be put up. I think we all concur in the opinion that that fence should be removed; and I will say, for the information of the gentleman from Ohio and the House, that the present architect is now preparing to take that fence away and put another in its place. This amendment consequently will be of no advantage, because the matter will be attended to without it. The architect concurs with the gentlemen of this House in the opinion that a fence of that character in such a place is a flagrant outrage upon good taste and propriety. No appropriation is necessary for the removal of that fence, because the expense will come out of the fund for the Capitol extension.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am very glad to have that explanation, so far as it goes, in vindication of the architect; but in reply I would remark that in the last Congress the assurance was given to this House that that fence would be removed before Congress should again assemble.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. But we have now another architect. The gentleman who had that fence put up is no longer connected with the Capitol, and the gentleman from Ohio may rest assured.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would prefer to "make assurance doubly sure" by requiring to be done that which no principle of good taste or sense of propriety has yet succeeded in bringing about. I must therefore insist on my amendment, though I am willing to reduce the amount to five or ten dollars. All that I desire is that we shall embody in this bill an indication of the judgment and the wish of Congress on this subject.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] suggests that that railing, being upon either side of a path leading from this end of the Capitol to the other, ought to be preserved for the benefit of ambitious gentlemen who desire to go from this House to the Senate; and I suppose he intended to express his entire sympathy with me in my failure to effect that object. I wish to console him as well as myself by saying that, whatever may have been his experience, it has been ascertained that a straightforward path is not the best by which to reach the Senate; and perhaps on that account it might be better that some change should be made in the direction given to that railing. Perhaps if the fence were made so low that one could ride upon it, and be "on the fence" occasionally, it would be an advantage to aspirants to senatorial honors. [Laughter.] I shall not be moved from my purpose by any suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois on that point. In his interest as well as my own, I shall adhere to the proposition that the bill be so amended as to express the judgment of this House unmistakably to the architect or whoever else may have control of this matter, that that fence must be taken away.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio by adding to it the following:

And that all stands for the sale or display of any articles whatever in any of the entrances to the House be removed.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I wish to say in this connection that the question with reference to the occupancy of the corridors or halls in the manner now complained of was referred some days since to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I send to the Clerk's desk a communication on this subject from the Commissioner of Public Buildings.

The Clerk read, as follows:

OFFICE COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS,
CAPITOL OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON CITY, February 10, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt from you of an order of the House of Representatives directing the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds "to inquire as to an alleged mutilation of the bronze doors at the south entrance to the old Hall; and also as to the occupancy for various purposes of said Hall and the passages leading thereto," with the request that I would furnish you with such information as I could, touching the subjects of the resolution.

The bronze doors were put up under the direction and supervision of the architect of the Capitol extension, they being considered a part of that structure. They had been up but a very short time, I have been told not over a week, when it was discovered that the sword in the hand of one of the figures, the chain upon the arms of a figure of Columbus, and the rein upon the neck of a mule, had been stolen. The moment my attention was called to the fact I placed the watchman who had been kept in the old Hall, in the passage south of the doors, and near them, with special directions to watch them closely, to suffer no one to handle them, and to seek that time to this, nothing has, to my knowledge, been stolen from them, and they have been constantly under the eye of that watchman whenever the Capitol has been open.

The old Hall is by law, made a hall for statuary to be furnished by the several States of the Union. Each State has been long since notified through the Department of State that the Hall is ready to receive such statuary, within the limit of the act of Congress, as they may think proper to send. None has yet been received. Several pieces of statuary had been deposited in the rotunda that it was desirable should be removed, and the old Hall being entirely empty, I thought it would be far better to place them there until the space should be wanted for the statuary that might be furnished from the States, than to have them incumbering the rotunda, and by my order the statue of Washington, the dying Tecumseh, and the statue of Kosciuszko were removed from the rotunda to the old Hall. Two busts, one of President Lincoln and one of President Johnson, have been placed in the old Hall by my permission. The statue of Freedom, by Crawford, being the original of the bronze figure which surmounts the dome was placed there through the agency of the Capitol extension, by direction of the Secretary of the Interior, under the impression, as I know, that it would be a matter of interest to all to see that original at a nearer view than could be gained of the bronze copy on the dome. It is placed there temporarily, and will be removed whenever the room shall be wanted for the legitimate purpose to which it is by law devoted.

In relation to the occupancy of the passages leading to the old Hall, I have to say that the law of Congress, and the regulations founded upon it, require the consent of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Commissioner of Public Buildings for such occupancy, and the occupant of every stand for the sale of any commodity whatever, has leave so to occupy from the Speaker and Commissioner. And at any moment when the Speaker pleases to withdraw his permission all such stands will be forthwith removed.

I believe the foregoing embraces all the information I can give touching the inquiries of the House.

I return the order of the House herein.

I am, with high respect, your obedient servant.

B. B. FRENCH.

Commissioner of Public Buildings.

Hon. J. H. RICE, Chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, House of Representatives United States.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. It is ascertained that all the persons occupying the halls and corridors on the House side of the Capitol do so under the written permission of the Speaker of this House, and as the Speaker has the control of the matter, I do not think it exactly right for us to take the question thus summarily into our hands. I think we should permit these persons to remain so long as they have the permission of the Speaker to do so. I think, so far as some of them are concerned, it would be well to have them removed. Perhaps the great hunter from the Rocky mountains, who is out in the corridor, with his scalps and Indian curiosities, might well be put inside of the iron railing. [Laughter.]

Mr. COLFAX, (Speaker.) Mr. Chairman, I wish to say one word, as my name has been brought into connection with this matter. When I entered upon the discharge of my duties as Presiding Officer of this House, I found it had been the usage for those who occupied the position of Presiding Officer, in each branch of Congress, to allow a number of stands in the halls and corridors. My own judgment was strongly against the granting of any such permission. At first I declined absolutely, but members of Congress came to me protesting that certain parties who had been allowed to occupy particular places under previous Speakers should not now be turned out. I disliked to set up my own judgment against what had been the previous usage, and I went over to the Senate end of the Capitol to ascertain what was the condition of affairs there, and found that the President of the Senate had consented to the establishment of various stands there, so that, rejecting some, I granted permission to others at this end. At this session, the permission which had been granted to some was renewed.

It is difficult to draw the line, if any are allowed at all. One is allowed to sell explanations of the bronze doors illustrating the life of Columbus. It is difficult to say no, because a great many persons would like to obtain them. Members will see how difficult it is to draw the line of distinction. I should prefer Congress would order all to be removed from this floor of the Capitol. My own idea is whatever permission is granted should be for the lower floor. Then, if persons choose to go down upon the lower floor, through which is a communication from one end of the Capitol to the other, let them go down there and purchase whatever they may desire from these stands.

As the usage had been on the part of my predecessors to grant permission for these stands, as I have already said, I reluctantly granted them myself.

Mr. STEVENS. I will say, in justice to the Speaker, that there are fewer of these stands now than there have ever been before. They are an accommodation, it would seem, to some of the members, and perhaps they ought not to be disturbed.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. These stands are certainly in the way, and I think most of them should be removed. I do not think there would be any objection to their removal on the part of the House. I believe if we leave the matter under the control of the Speaker, as heretofore, with a simple expression of our opinion on this question, it will accomplish the result we all have in view.

I will refer to a single instance, and that is in regard to the stand where refreshments are sold. I think its effect on the small boys—the pages about this House—is bad. They are constantly in the way, and the passage is being blocked up. I think all such stands should be removed.

Now, in regard to the model of the figure which is upon the top of the dome, every one must concede that it is in a bad place in the old Hall. No one can object to its removal. The Commissioner of Public Buildings says it was only placed there temporarily. But I suggest that the crest be taken from the head of the figure, and that something in accordance with the design of Mr. Crawford himself be put in its stead. The history of the matter is interesting. There was a long correspondence between the artist and Jefferson Davis on the subject. The first design of the artist was to put a wreath upon the head of the figure, but that Mr. Davis objected to. Then he proposed to put a liberty cap upon it, and that Mr. Davis objected to because it was the historical emblem of a freed slave and he said ought not to be there. I would have the present monstrous crest taken off, for as you look at the figure upon the dome of the Capitol coming up toward it, it looks precisely like a donkey's head. [Laughter.] Let us take off the donkey's head and put in its place the liberty cap as the artist intended.

A MEMBER. Is it a donkey's or a darkey's head? [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. I also suggest she be provided with hoops, for she looks awfully as she is. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to amend by adding the following:

And especially that last and most egregious humbug, the woolly horse, with the horns and the bear's paw.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the gentleman will amend so as to provide for the removal of the stands from this floor in consequence of the suggestion of the Speaker, who anticipated in his explanation what I was myself going to propose.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I agree to that.

Mr. STEVENS. I must insist that this is new legislation altogether.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman is not quite so sharp as some of his friends. It is too late to make the objection.

Mr. STEVENS. It is not too late; it is just offered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest that we simply require that at these stands where they sell cakes they shall use fresh lard instead of rancid. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will allow me, I would like to make a single remark.

Mr. STEVENS. I consent.

Mr. SCHENCK. This may seem to be frivolous to the chairman of the committee; it seems to me, however, that it is worth a little consideration.

Mr. STEVENS. I pass the frivolity over to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, let it pass over to my friend from Illinois. I think it is well that we should legislate upon this subject. In the first place, so far as my original amendment is concerned, I am not satisfied with the explanation made by the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Public Grounds, that we ought on that account to refrain from passing some rule that should be binding upon this subject; because, as I said before, we had the same assurance last year that if we would let alone those that were in charge of the Capitol as architects, the Commissioner of Public Buildings would see that this nuisance was abated. It is not done. We are told now that there is a new architect, who in the matter of taste entirely concurs with what seems to be the prevailing judgment and wish of this House. If so, of course so much the better, for, as he concurs with the views of the House on that subject, he will willingly obey the rule when we lay it down to him. There is no harm done in directing it; there might be in omitting it. By directing it we have in the present architect one who will at once obey the order, while by failing to do so we might possibly have some delay that we need not wish to be subjected to.

Then so far as regards the removal of these stands for the sale of apples, ginger-nuts, and drinks of various kinds, to say nothing of deer skins and California curiosities, the Speaker has explained to us that he has yielded against his own better judgment and granted these privileges to various persons. Now, then, as we come to the aid of the good taste of the architect in backing him up by passing, as I hope we shall, the first portion of the amendment, let us also protect the Speaker against his own amiability. He will willingly obey us just as the architect does. But I fear that the architect under outside influences, and the Speaker under the influence of his amiability—and every one knows how kind-hearted he is—may be induced by the pressing solicitation of his friends, or by the parties themselves, to do that which he will feel glad not to have to do. If we make it a matter of legislation, he cannot yield to his amiable impulses by allowing an offense against the law.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask my friend to withdraw the motion.

Mr. STEVENS. Very well.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope, sir, that the committee will not leave this subject until they have taken decided action. Congress having taken upon itself the control of this building for its own use, I ask upon what authority any officer of the Government will take it upon himself to appropriate it for other purposes? And in addition to the removal of all these stands, which I regard as not only an inconvenience to the members of this House, but as a disgrace, because they clog up and interfere with the ingress and egress of members, I hope that all of these things, including the woolly horse and this huge monster that is behind the rail, will be removed. It is apparent that the large plaster cast of the statue of Liberty is not beautiful in itself where it stands. Being too high up, it destroys the beauty of that old Hall. Therefore I hope it will be excluded.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think by unanimous consent we can agree to close the general debate without going into the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope we shall do that by unanimous consent. It will not cut off the five minutes' debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly bill of the House No. 86, making additional appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1866, and for other purposes, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

CLOSE OF DEBATE.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to close the general debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the deficiency bill in one minute after the committee shall resume its consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move to close all debate on the pending paragraph of the bill in one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act authorizing an increase of the clerical force in the Post Office Department; when the Speaker signed the same.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. STEVENS. One or two gentlemen desire to make speeches to-night, and I will therefore move that the House take a recess from half past four o'clock until half past seven, and that the evening session be solely for debate on the President's message; no action to be taken.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] accept the amendment proposed by his colleague, [Mr. SPALDING?]

Mr. SCHENCK. I did not understand clearly what it was. I think it was met by the proposition made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. SPALDING. My amendment is supplied by the amendment to the amendment now pending, and I will not press it.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and it was agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. SCHENCK's amendment as amended.

Mr. SCHENCK. I modify my amendment so as to make the appropriation ten dollars instead of $100, as I understand the change can be made without expense.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the point in the bill that we have now reached:

For the removal of the crest from the head of the goddess of Liberty on the dome of the Capitol, $500, or as much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. SPALDING. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois if he refers to the statue in the Hall or to the one on the dome?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I mean the one on the top of the dome.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] in regard to the removal of that crest, that that question was considered, and an estimate made as to the cost of removing it, when the stagings were up; and it was estimated that $7,500 was the least for which it could be accomplished. And I undertake to say that it would now cost at least $25,000 to remove that crest from the head of the figure and put on another.

Mr. STEVENS. This is all out of order, I think. It is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Mr. STEVENS,] and rules the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] to be out of order.

The Clerk continued the reading of the bill to the close of the following paragraph:

For fitting up rooms in the basement, under the court-room of the Supreme Court, for a consultation room for the court, $5,000.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to amend by inserting after the clause just read the following:

For alterations and repairs of the court-house in the city of Boston, $5,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I raise the point of order that this amendment contemplates new legislation, and is therefore out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The following clause was then read:

For annual repairs of the President's House and furniture, improvement of grounds, purchase of plants for garden, and contingent expenses incident thereto, $6,000.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend by inserting after the clause just read the following, being one of a series of amendments which I will send to the Clerk's desk:

For sewer in Four-and-a-half street, in front of reservation between Missouri avenue and the canal, $1,000.

Mr. STEVENS. I think that had better be left out of this bill; it is out of order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Why is it out of order?

Mr. STEVENS. I think the sewer is very much out of order. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, unless there is a law authorizing the work for which the appropriation is asked.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is a law for it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then find it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I propose to find it. I do not know of a better time to offer these amendments than to this deficiency bill.

Mr. GRINNELL. I rise to a question of order, that this is clearly out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides the amendment to be in order if there is a law for the appropriation.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There has been expended the sum of about seventy thousand dollars for paving and improving the public streets, avenues, and reservations of this city; those which lie contiguous to the public reservations and public grounds.

The appropriation asked for in this amendment is authorized by law, and has been authorized by law. The money has been advanced by the city for the reason that the fund which had been provided by Congress had been exhausted. This money has been expended by the authorities of the city of Washington in payment of these improvements. And there are other appropriations asked for in the list of amendments which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

They have all been thoroughly considered by the Committee for the District of Columbia; the accounts presented by the city to pay which this appropriation is asked have been examined; every voucher and every item of the expenditure have been examined, and the Committee for the District of Columbia have instructed me to ask that this money be appropriated to reimburse the city of Washington for the money it has expended under acts of Congress authorizing these improvements.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand this to be a claim of the city of Washington. There is no act of Congress authorizing the city to do this work.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I did not say there ever was. The money has been furnished the Commissioner of Public Buildings by the city, and this appropriation is to reimburse him.

Mr. KASSON. As the rule has been stated, I wish to speak upon that point a moment, to show that on previous occasions the decision of the Chair has been that any amendment is in order upon an appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole which is designed to carry on or complete works authorized by some previous law, of which I regard the one under consideration to be one, and in that point of view I suppose this amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hold it to be in order if there is a previous law for it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is such a law.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask for the law. And I suggest to my colleague [Mr.

INGERSOLL] that this is not the proper place for his amendment, but that as he is chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia he can bring in his little matters in a bill from that committee.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think this is the proper place for it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think these things should not be let in here.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I know my colleague, [Mr. WASHBURN,] wants to let in all that should be let in. I am as strict in those matters as he can be, yet I am in favor of this Government paying every cent it ought to pay, and not one cent more. I want this Congress to make appropriations to discharge all the claims against the Government, just as an individual would do, and nothing more.

Now, in 1820, Congress passed a law providing for the sale of certain lots that were donated to the United States Government by the original proprietors of the city of Washington. More than ten thousand lots were given to the Government by this city. By an act passed May 15, 1820, Congress provided that the money arising from the sale of these lots should be expended for the improvement of the streets and avenues around the public grounds. In 1864 an act was passed declaring that the Government of the United States should pay its equitable proportion of all these improvements of the avenues and streets running around the public grounds.

The fund arising from the sale of those ten thousand lots donated to the General Government has been exhausted, and in view of its exhaustion Congress, in 1864, passed an act, the third section of which provides—

"That in all cases in which the streets, avenues, or alleys of the said city pass through or by any of the property of the United States, the Commissioner of Public Buildings shall pay to the duly authorized officer of the corporation the just proportion of the expense incurred in improving such avenue, street, or alley which the said property bears to the whole cost thereof, to be ascertained in the same manner as the same is apportioned among the individual proprietors of the property improved thereby."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The Chairman, as I understand, has ruled that this amendment is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the rule applicable to this question.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will also read the law cited by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read the third section of the act of 1864, as quoted in the remarks of Mr. INGERSOLL.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment is in order, as an appropriation under the law of 1864 to improve the streets in front of the public grounds.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to inquire what obligation rests upon Congress, under that act of 1864, to make this appropriation?

Mr. INGERSOLL. If time be allowed me, I will read the various acts of Congress relating to this question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that my colleague will not undertake to introduce his budget into this bill. I trust that he will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir; I will not withdraw it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I hope the House will vote it down. Let the gentleman report these propositions from the Committee for the District of Columbia when that committee shall be called.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If this committee do not desire to act honorably and fairly they will reject this amendment; but if they desire that the Government shall pay its just debts under existing laws, then they will adopt it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. ROLLINS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to read the section of the act of 1820, to which I have referred.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPALDING. I appeal to the gentleman to report these appropriations in a bill from the Committee for the District of Columbia; and then we will vote for them.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is it not just as easy to consider them now?

Mr. SPALDING. It is not. It only confuses this bill.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If I thought that it confused this bill, I do not know but that I would bring in a separate bill; but I do not see why the House cannot consider this subject as well now as at any future time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to show that this amendment simply proposes to make provision for the payment of what is justly chargeable to the Government.

The fifteenth section of the act of May 15, 1820, provides:

"That the Commissioner of Public Buildings or other person appointed to superintend the United States disbursements in the city of Washington shall reimburse to the said corporation a just proportion of any expense which may hereafter be incurred in laying open, paving, or otherwise improving any of the streets or avenues in front of, or adjoining to, or which may pass through or between, any of the public squares or reservations, which proportion shall be determined by a comparison of the length of the front or fronts of the said squares or reservations of the United States on any such street or avenue with the whole extent of the two sides thereof; and he shall cause the curbstones to be set and footways to be paved on the side or sides of any such street or avenue, whenever the said corporation shall by law direct such improvements to be made by the proprietors of the lots on the opposite side of any such street or avenue, or adjacent to any such square or reservation; and shall cause the footways to be paved and the curbstones to be set in front of any lot or lots belonging to the United States when the like improvements shall be ordered by the corporation in front of the lots adjoining or squares adjacent thereto; and he shall defray the expenses directed by this section out of any monies arising from the sale of lots in the city of Washington belonging to the United States, and from no other fund."

Mr. STEVENS. I thought it was only $1,000. All the items, of which the amendment now offered is one, amount to some sixty-nine thousand dollars.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is true.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I hope this will be allowed to come in separately, so that we may be enabled to consider it properly. Let it not be brought in this way, but let it come regularly from the gentleman's committee.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That which was offered and under consideration was the first item and was for $1,000.

Mr. STEVENS. That is what I mean. Does not the gentleman mean to follow it up with the others?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. I want the members to understand, then, we are to appropriate $70,000 under this one amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let me say that I would be glad to have it offered and discussed as one amendment. I would be glad if the gentleman would allow me to do so, so that the question may now be discussed. I believe that the rights of the people of the city of Washington are as sacred as the rights of the people of the city of Baltimore. We appropriated $109,000 a little while ago to reimburse the contractor of the Baltimore post office building. Sixty-nine thousand dollars have been expended on these improvements on F street, Four-and-a-half street, and Missouri avenue. These permanent improvements of this city have been made and the money has been expended, and it is necessary that we should reimburse it. Here is the report of the Commissioner, and the report of the Committee for the District of Columbia, which sustain the amendment I have offered. The report of the Commissioner specifies every item of the account, the amount of work done and the value of it, and the location in which it has been done.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BALDWIN. I must oppose the amendment. There can be no doubt, sir, that the sum here proposed under the act of 1864 has actually been incurred by the city by virtue of that act, but the trouble is as to the act itself. I do not know what were the influences which secured the passage of that act, but it is very certain that it is an act under which deficiencies of this kind will constantly occur, and perhaps to a very great amount, unless it be modified or repealed. It gives a very large charter to Washington city to tax the Government whenever it pleases and to any amount. If under the authority of that act this has occurred I wish to bring the attention of the committee and of gentlemen to the fact that larger amounts than this may come next year or the year afterward, and so long as that act exists. I think, therefore, we should take into consideration whether the act itself should not be modified or repealed.

Mr. ROLLINS. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I renew the amendment, and mainly for this purpose: it has been decided, very correctly I think, that the amendment is in order. A law of Congress puts us in charge of these streets and avenues and public places, and I am in favor of the general policy which shall look to embellishing in some degree this city when that shall become practicable and consistent with economy; at least of taking care of it and making it habitable for those who live and who shall come here, and not a disgrace to the United States of which it is the capital.

As to the character of the amendments which have been offered, what is the character of legislation generally in reference to these appropriations? Your Committee on Appropriations bring in a bill providing for various items of public expenditure. Whence do they get their information? The head of a Department who has remitted his duty necessarily to the head of a bureau, and the head of a bureau to some clerk, who makes an estimate for a particular thing, and because they are unable to enter into a thorough investigation of every item, the Committee on Appropriations adopt these estimates, coming from the Executive Departments, and got up by some clerk on the information before him. That may be well enough; it is the settled practice, and it is not easy to escape from it. But should we accord more pertinence, more weight, more character to an estimate of appropriation in regard to any public expenditure coming from one of the Executive Departments in that way than we do when the same thing, perfectly within our power, is proposed by the appropriate committee, which has made a thorough investigation of the whole subject? I would not go for any expenses of this kind if they were brought forward on any side, on the suggestion of any individual, without clearly understanding there was some merit in them.

But without it, if we are disposed to follow our committees at all, it seems to me we ought at least to give as much weight to a serious recommendation after investigation made by one of the committees of this House to amend an appropriation bill, as to give weight and authority to a mere estimate sent to Congress by one of the Executive Departments. And I say, as a general principle of legislation, if I understand it, that is a right mode of proceeding. And I am disposed, therefore, to follow this committee when it has acted in that way, and to record my vote to sustain the conclusions to which it has arrived.

The chairman of the committee, however, says that this is improper, because, although the thing may be perfectly right, the Committee for the District of Columbia may bring in its own bill. Now, everybody knows that the committees of this House, with the exception of the Committee on Appropriations, have no opportunity of bringing in appropriation bills and getting them acted upon. There is a privilege granted to the Committee on Appropriations to make reports at all times, and have them considered, and the only way in which other committees can get their matters considered and acted upon is to propose them by way of amendment to one of the appropriation bills.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] is slightly mistaken in regard to that matter, because the House gives a certain number of days, when asked for by the Committee for the District of Columbia, to consider their business, and we go into Committee of the Whole and consider their business seriatim.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am aware of that. So the House gives certain days to private bills and other purposes, but those special days are almost always set aside.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Never. I have never known the time when the District of Columbia did not have a full share of the time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I renew it. I wish to say, from some little experience on the Committee for the District of Columbia, that my friend from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] is in error in respect to the time which has generally been awarded to that committee. I served on it two years, and I know it was with the greatest difficulty we were able to get a day assigned to begin with, and then when it came it was very difficult to get three bills through this House; and most of the bills which were passed were presented by the courtesy of the House upon leave.

And while on the floor, allow me to say that I believe it is due to the Government itself, to its character for honorable and fair dealing, that we should recognize the claims which exist against us by the city of Washington, and which have been incurred under congressional legislation. I know no reason why, if we are able to do justice, we should not be willing to do it. We certainly have authorized expenditures for the improvement of this capital. I believe that no question arises that the District of Columbia is not in the Union. That we have settled, at least, and therefore I think we may legislate as if this was, and is to continue to be, the capital of a great Republic, and we should make it worthy of the national character. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I renew it. We have been in session now for two months and over, and I am satisfied, if the committee see proper to disregard the recommendation of the Committee for the District of Columbia with regard to this matter, they would disregard it if we should bring in a special bill at some future time. And I am satisfied that we can never get that bill reported from that committee and go into Committee of the Whole in time to get an appropriation through Congress. I do not know how long we shall continue in session—whether thirty, sixty, or ninety days—but if the cholera should come at the end of thirty or forty days, I should move to adjourn. I want this appropriation made because it is just and authorized by law, and I hope the committee will consider it now and pay the money that has actually been expended under authority of law. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. INGERSOLL, and it was agreed to—ayes 64, noes 30.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I propose now to offer all these items for the District of Columbia as one amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I shall demand a separate vote on each proposition.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well; then let us have them voted on separately.

I offer the following amendment:

For paving and graveling Seventeenth street in front of the President's grounds and down to canal, $1,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am opposed to that amendment for the reason, in the first place, that it has no business in this bill; and in the second place, because we are asked to appropriate $70,000 for matters about which we literally know nothing. There are no reports on this matter, and we do not know how much the Government is entitled to pay in any case. We are called upon to vote blindly this vast sum of money to the city of Washington. If you look through this bill you will see the appropriations it contains for this city. I ask gentlemen to look at these appropriations before they vote away the money of their constituents. Here is an appropriation of $85,000 for lighting the cities of Washington and Georgetown. We are no more called upon to light the city of Georgetown than to light the city of Galena. In voting away these sums of money we are adding to the burdens of our constituents, and I for one protest against it.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to correct one statement the gentleman has made. There is no appropriation in this bill for lighting the city of Georgetown at all. By referring to that clause he will find that it is for lighting the bridge on High street, a part of which is in Washington and a part in Georgetown, and there will probably be an expense for the lighting of one lamp on the Georgetown side of the bridge.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Iowa is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and he ought to know that this is an appropriation for lighting Bridge and High streets, Georgetown.

Mr. KASSON. The bridge on High street, I think.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir; Bridge and High streets, Georgetown, are to be lighted at the public expense.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is a matter that does not interest me. It has nothing to do with my amendment, and I do not propose to have this appropriation which I ask in behalf of the District of Columbia prejudiced by any appropriations reported in the bill by the Committee on Appropriations.

I have this to say in reply to my colleague, that this appropriation of $1,000 asked for has been authorized by law, and the Secretary of the Interior reports in favor of it. The amendment is offered by the direction of the Committee for the District of Columbia, and the Commissioner of Public Buildings is in favor of allowing this amount, because he has examined the claim and found it just.

Mr. RADFORD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether the money has been spent?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Every cent of it.

Mr. RADFORD. By whom?

Mr. INGERSOLL. By the Commissioner of Public Buildings?

Mr. RADFORD. By what authority?

Mr. INGERSOLL. By the authority of the act of Congress of May 5, 1864.

Mr. RADFORD. Will the gentleman read the law to which he refers?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have read it once, but I will read it again if the gentleman desires it, or I will hand it to him.

Mr. RADFORD. Just as the gentleman pleases. I only desire to vote understandingly.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will read it, then. It is as follows:

"That in all cases in which the streets, avenues, or alleys of the said city pass through or by any of the property of the United States, the Commissioner of Public Buildings shall pay to the duly authorized officer of the corporation a just proportion of the expense incurred in improving such avenue, street, or alley which said property bears to the whole cost thereof, to be ascertained in the same manner as the same is apportioned among the individual proprietors of the property improved thereby."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to ask my colleague when this money was expended by the city?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I did not say that it was expended by the city at all.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. When was it expended by anybody?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will tell you exactly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I undertake to say that the money was expended ten years ago, and that it is a stale claim.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is not a stale claim; I deny it. The money was not expended ten years ago.

Mr. RADFORD. Will the gentleman tell us when it was expended?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will turn to the accounts. Let me explain this matter to the committee; but I cannot very well do it in five minutes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That was the very reason why I tried to persuade my colleague to let it go over until the Committee for the District of Columbia have a whole day, when we will hear him for an hour with pleasure.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If that is the only objection my colleague has, I am glad to know it. I thought he was on the economy side of the question, but it seems now it is a matter of time. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask for information, whether some of these expenditures were not made before the law was passed?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Not one cent of them.

Mr. SPALDING. Were not some of the expenditures made before the law of 1864 was passed?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I should like to have a little time to explain the amendment.

Mr. ORTH. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word of it; and I yield my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I thank my friend for yielding to me. By the act of 1820, which I have read, the Government of the United States took upon itself to pay its equitable proportion of the expense of the improvements made by the direction of the city authorities on the streets which pass by or are contiguous to the public reservations and avenues.

Mr. SPALDING. Then the present item of expenditure does not come under the law of 1864?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir. Under the act of 1820 a certain fund was appropriated by the Government to pay for these improvements. That fund was realized from the sale of lots which were given to the Government of the United States by the original proprietors of this city. In 1852 or 1853 that fund was exhausted. A quarter of a million of dollars had been realized in that way and had been expended. At least $100,000 had been expended upon building the Presidential Mansion, and for other purposes of public improvement in this city. There were lots left for sale, but there was no fund to pay for the improvements which were continually being made, according to the law. In 1861 or 1862 the Commissioner of Public Buildings sold some more of the lots, the last of them, I believe. That fund was expended as far as it went. A portion of these claims run back as far as 1854.

Mr. SPALDING. Who owns the claims now?

Mr. INGERSOLL. The Government.

Mr. SPALDING. Are any of them in the hands of private parties?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Not one cent.

Mr. SPALDING. Who stated the account?

Mr. INGERSOLL. The city of Washington.

Mr. SPALDING. Why have not former committees of this House reported in favor of such an appropriation as this?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not know.

Mr. STEVENS. Was this work done in 1854 or 1855? If so, why should not this claim go to the Committee of Claims?

Mr. INGERSOLL. It ought not to go to that committee. I will read what the Secretary of the Interior says upon this point:

"In the year 1820 Congress provided that from the proceeds of the sale of public lots reimbursement should be made to the city of Washington of an equitable proportion of the expenses thereafter incurred in laying open, paving, and otherwise improving the streets and avenues adjacent to the public squares and reservations. I am informed that, since the passage of this act, three thousand seven hundred and twenty-five lots of this class have been sold, and the proceeds paid into the Treasury of the United States, while no reimbursement has been made to the city for the sum of $37,410 61 paid for improvements properly chargeable to this fund. An appropriation should be made for refunding this amount and the interest which has accrued thereon."

This relates to the amounts which I have presented here, and of which a portion is now under consideration. I do not ask for any interest, but only that the Government shall provide another fund, as the fund before provided was exhausted before this amount was liquidated. The Secretary goes on to say:

"During the past summer and fall the improvement of streets adjacent to public property has rendered the Government liable to a considerable amount, and an additional sum will be needed to meet similar expenses which will probably be incurred during the next fiscal year. It is hoped that Congress will at an early date make provision to meet these liabilities. Several of the streets of Washington have been paved in a neat and substantial manner since the adjournment of Congress, and the municipal authorities are making like improvements upon other streets, which will add greatly both to their beauty and their utility as public thoroughfares. It is submitted that Congress should encourage this spirit by corresponding improvements upon the avenues. The Commissioner of Public Buildings refers to the dilapidated condition of the pavement on Pennsylvania avenue, and recommends that an appropriation be made by Congress for the substitution of either the Belgian or the Nicholson pavement throughout its length, and also for the opening and grading of such of the remaining avenues leading to the Capitol as remain closed. These avenues are under the exclusive control of Congress, and justice seems imperatively to require that the national Government should defray the expense of paving and keeping them in repair. If the burden of paving the avenues, as well as the streets, is to be thrown upon the owners of contiguous property, the mayor suggests that the law be so amended as to reduce the width of the carriage-ways, and that the intervening space between them and the pavement be flanked with a line of curbstones, sodded, and planted with ornamental shade trees."

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to ask the gentleman a single question. For what amount did those lots sell? What amount was paid into the Treasury of the United States from the proceeds of that sale?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Over a quarter of a million dollars.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Is that all gone?

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is all gone.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand this amendment is put upon the ground of cleansing the city so as to prevent the cholera from coming here. Now, it may be very proper to pass this, for it is an old rotten claim which has been festering since 1855; and if we do not get rid of it soon, the cholera will certainly attack us. [Laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not care upon what grounds the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] puts it, I put it upon the ground of justice; and so does the Committee for the District of Columbia. If Congress does not see fit to pass it I shall have discharged my duty.

Mr. DAVIS. If I now understand the question properly, it seems that the Government owning these lots, by donation from the original proprietors, undertook to improve them, and to pay for that improvement out of funds arising from the sale of a portion of the lots.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. It was for that reason that I addressed the inquiry to the chairman of the committee, and now I desire to know whether he can inform us what amount has been expended from the fund thus created by the sale of the lots; whether there is in the Treasury to-day any money belonging properly to the fund arising from the sale of those lands.

Mr. INGERSOLL. In reply, I will state that not a single dollar of the money arising from the sale of those lots remains in the Treasury. But nothing like the whole of that amount was ever paid for improving the streets.

Mr. DAVIS. What I desire to know is, whether there is remaining to the credit of this fund any part of the sum arising from the sale of these lots. If the Government has appropriated that money to other uses, then it certainly does not rest with us to say that we will not recognize the equity created by the original arrangement and by the sale of the property. If the Government received the money, it is bound honorably and honestly to pay it according to the terms of the contract.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether this claim was ever presented before.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Why has it not been presented?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, I never inquired. It is immaterial about that. The facts are as I state them.

I now desire to add a word or two in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DAVIS.] As I have stated, a quarter of a million dollars has been realized and has gone into the Treasury of the United States by reason of the sale of these lots which were donated to the Government of the United States; and more than $100,000 of that money was appropriated to building the Executive Mansion. If the city of Washington had had appropriated for its benefit all the money that has arisen—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise to stop this talk.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, I submit, has no right to speak about "stopping this talk."

Mr. STEVENS. Well, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then it is all right.

Mr. ORTH. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. I move to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That no payment shall be made on account of any appropriations herein provided, to reimburse the city of Washington for improvements heretofore constructed in front of or through the public grounds, until the items have been properly examined and audited as to legality and amount by the proper officer of the Treasury.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have no objection whatever to that amendment; I am willing that it shall apply to all these appropriations.

Mr. CONKLING. I want to be sure to apply it to everything that relates to the city of Washington. If there is any case in which we ought not to make doubtful appropriations it is the case of the city of Washington. For one, from motives both of economy and self-respect, I think it not worth while to overdo appropriations for Washington. We and our constituents get little in return, except the impositions to which all comers are subjected in this city. For one I mean to vote against appropriations for this city in every case in which I can justify myself in doing so, and in addition to that, I would like to be sure that the proper auditing officer shall scrutinize every item before it is paid.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I agree with the gentleman in his last proposition, that every item should be scrutinized before it is paid. I accept his amendment as a modification of mine.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. INGERSOLL as modified,

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 38; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. INGERSOLL and STEVENS.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 67.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move the following amendment:

Paving carriage-way of Ninth street west, from B street to Pennsylvania avenue, $2,882 16.

Mr. STEVENS. I make the point of order that that is an old claim, and ought to be referred to the Committee of Claims. It is certainly not in order to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposed when the first amendment was offered it was under the act of 1864, which was read. It appears that these are appropriations made by the common council of Washington city some ten years ago, and the Chair rules the amendment to be out of order. It may be a claim against this Government, but it is not in order to an appropriation bill.

Mr. INGERSOLL. These are based upon acts of Congress prior to the act of 1864; but for the present I will confine myself to those under the act of 1864. I move the following, under that act:

For the improvement of Fourteenth street, across Ohio avenue, across Pennsylvania avenue, and in front of the reservation south side of avenue, in front of Franklin square, and across Vermont and Massachusetts avenues, one thousand one hundred and forty-five feet, $9,918.

Mr. STEVENS. When was that work done?

Mr. INGERSOLL. It was done last summer, under the act of 1864.

Mr. STEVENS. We are making appropriations for the District of Columbia, when they are recommended. I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, as this expenditure was made, not under an act of Congress, but under an act of the common council of Washington.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let me refer to the acts of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can do so by unanimous consent.

Objection was made.

Mr. INGERSOLL. All the other amendments I proposed to offer rest upon the same basis.

Mr. CONKLING. I move to add the following to the amendment which has been adopted:

Provided, No payment shall be made on account of any appropriations herein contained to reimburse the city of Washington for improvements heretofore constructed in front of or through the public grounds until the items have been properly examined and audited as to legality and amount by the proper officers of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For annual repairs of the President's House and furniture, improvement of grounds, purchase of plants for garden, and contingent expenses incident thereto, $6,000.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I move to strike that out. We have already appropriated $46,000 for the repair of the White House, and I think we can dispense with this amount.

Mr. STEVENS. This is for the usual repairs. It is for the improvement of the grounds, purchase of plants, &c.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I understand that.

Mr. STEVENS. It is different from furnishing the house.

Mr. SCHENCK. We have already passed an appropriation, as follows:

To enable the Commissioner of Public Buildings to properly refurnish and repair the President's House, in conformity with his estimate, $46,000, the old furniture to be disposed of under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Now, we propose another for annual repairs. Annual, monthly, or daily repairs, if necessary, ought to be made and paid for, but we ought to see that the same work is not paid for a second time under another name.

Mr. KASSON. The object will be accomplished by striking out the words "annual repairs of the," leaving the balance of the section, as something will be required to keep the grounds in repair.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I accept that, leaving it $2,000.

Mr. KASSON. Make it $3,000.

The amendment was then stated, as follows:

For improvement of grounds, purchase of plants for garden, and contingent expenses incident thereto, $3,000.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. Two thousand dollars, I said.

The amendment making the sum $2,000 was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to call attention to the amount of appropriation for gas for Washington and Georgetown:

For lighting the Capitol and President's House, the public grounds around them, and around the executive offices, and Pennsylvania avenue, Bridge and High streets in Georgetown, Four-and-a-half street, Seventh and Twelfth streets across the Mall, and Maryland avenue west, and Sixth street south, $85,000.

Now, I desire to propound this question to the committee, whether it is right to vote this vast sum to light these two cities? I am willing enough to vote a reasonable sum to light the Capitol, the President's House, Pennsylvania avenue, and Four-and-a-half street. Therefore I move to strike out "Bridge and High streets in Georgetown, Seventh and Twelfth streets across the Mall, and Maryland avenue west, and Sixth street south, $85,000," and make the appropriation $50,000.

Mr. KASSON. Before that is put I ought to say that the committee have deemed it better to keep the streets that are traversed by members of Congress lighted at night—according to the custom of many years past, for there is not a particle of change in that respect in this bill—than to have robberies, thefts, and murders committed in the dark in those streets. It is simply a question of safety. The city is not required to do it, and it is the customary expenditure that has been adopted by Congress from year to year, according to existing rules. Of course, the House may strike it out if it sees fit. There is no possible feeling on the part of the committee.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would like to know what public buildings or property are to be protected on High and Bridge streets, Georgetown.

Mr. KASSON. I have only to say that this portion of the expenditure is one that has been regarded as belonging to the United States Government, as distinct from the city's portion.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The United States Government has nothing in Georgetown.

Mr. KASSON. Officers of the Government have resided and now reside in both cities, and it is a system adopted by previous Congresses, having been regarded as proper expenditure to be borne by the Government.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope there will be a stop to it. These gas companies came in and got an enormous increase of their rates, and we are paying them now about twice as much as we have heretofore paid.

Mr. SCHENCK. Before the vote is taken I propose to amend the original clause by inserting the words "G street, west of Eighteenth street." It is a very respectable street, for I live in it, but it is as dark as Erebus. It is a well-built street, and light is very much needed in it, especially if one should be out late at night, going home in the small hours of the morning.

Mr. O'NEILL. Include also Thirteenth street west, between E and F.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection, for I know that just as my locality needs to be lighted for the benefit of gentlemen who are called out at night on public business, it is still more essential to my friend from Pennsylvania that his district should be lighted.

Mr. RADFORD. Where does the gentleman from Pennsylvania reside? If it is his district I hope it will be added.

Mr. SCHENCK. We pay enormously for gas in this city, those who occupy houses, and the Government pays its proportion, and yet the city is not well lighted. Although the gas is good as far as it goes, yet the city is poorly lighted in many parts of it.

And while I am upon this subject I want to state a fact which I dare say is generally known to members of Congress who are confined upon committees and otherwise kept out late at night. There is a practice existing in this city, as in some other towns, of relying upon the moon, whether it shines or not, on certain nights in the month. But there is another unusual practice I have found here, of putting out all the lights, retaining only those on one or two of the principal avenues, at one o'clock in the morning. Now, I happen to have seen this thing done once or twice. I have seen the lamp-lighter about one o'clock, or a little before, with his ladder going from post to post extinguishing lights in a number of streets, no matter how intensely dark it might be, just as if it were a notification to burglars who suspend their work till a certain hour in the morning,

"Now, as you will not be troubled by the police, you need not be by gas-lights either." I should like to know from the gentlemen who have charge of this matter why, when we appropriate money for gas in Washington, the lamps are continually extinguished at that hour, and most of the streets left during the latter part of the night in utter darkness.

Mr. KASSON. I will say in reply, as one member of the Committee on Appropriations, that if you do not appropriate money enough to pay for the gas according to the rates that you have yourselves established, you must be left in the dark. If you will appropriate for the amount of gas consumed and direct that the lamps be kept lighted all night, then the gas company will furnish the gas and keep the lamps burning. That was the information of the Committee on Appropriations, and this amount was fixed upon with reference to that basis.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the difficulty in the Government paying like any other consumer for the gas actually consumed in the public business by the public authorities?

Mr. STEVENS. That is the way they do pay now.

Mr. CONKLING. According to this appropriation? This provides for extending the gas pipes.

Mr. STEVENS. This provides for the gas consumed by the Government at a little less than the rate other consumers pay.

Mr. CONKLING. What use is made by the public authorities of gas on these streets in Georgetown?

Mr. STEVENS. The Government owns the property up at the Circle, and owns the bridge, too; and the Government has always lighted those streets.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. High street is half a mile from the bridge.

The question was taken on Mr. SCHENCK's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. KASSON. In order to refer to a former law, I move to strike out the last three words of the clause.

It will be found that in 1864—and this appropriation was intended for 1865 and 1866—we appropriated $63,500 for lighting these identical grounds, avenues, and streets; and if gentlemen will go back to former laws, they will find that we have done it habitually.

In consequence of the increase in the price of gas authorized by the last Congress, an additional amount is required in the appropriation for this year. There is not a single appropriation here for lighting any new street, avenue, or ground.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We are required now to appropriate $22,000 more than we did last year. By adopting my amendment we shall keep the appropriation down to the proper sum.

Mr. KASSON. The increase in the appropriations is in consequence of the action of Congress in authorizing an increase in the price of gas, owing to the increased price of coal.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There was no necessity for it; it was only by lobbying that it was got through Congress.

Mr. KASSON. I withdraw my amendment. The question was then taken on Mr. WASHBURN's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move now to strike out the proviso, which is as follows:

Provided, That in order to enable the Washington Gas-Light Company to extend their pipes, and to accommodate the public in the remoter parts of the city, said company is hereby authorized to increase its capital stock $500,000, subject to the same liability as is provided in the eleventh section of the original act of incorporation, approved July 8, 1843.

I will very frankly admit that I know upon this subject, I think, pretty nearly as much as almost any other member of this House. and that is scarcely anything at all. Although it is upon the subject of gas, we are legislating, I think, very much in the dark. This much, however, I do know, that Congress last year added something near fifty per cent., at any rate a very large proportion, of increase to the cost of gas in this city, making it a very expensive necessary indeed. And now it is proposed, in order to enable the Washington Gas-Light Company to extend their pipes to accommodate the public in the remoter parts of the city, to authorize the company to increase its capital stock $500,000, subject to the same liability as is provided in the original act of incorporation.

Five hundred thousand dollars would incorporate a pretty respectable gas company in almost any of our towns; but as a mere incidental increase to its existing capital stock it is proposed that this company shall now be permitted to add $500,000.

Now, it may be or it may not be, that having made gas-making a very profitable business here, by largely increasing the cost of the article, the stock has become so valuable that it will bear watering, and that this proviso means that or something like it. I do not know that that is so; but putting the two things together, the large increase of the cost of gas last year, with the not very perceptible increase of facilities afforded for getting about, by means of the better lighting of the streets, I am inclined to suspect that in this proposition to add $500,000 to the capital stock there may be a project for watering stock which has now become so valuable that it will bear a little dilution. If I am mistaken in that I shall be glad to have this proviso explained by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who has introduced the appropriation and recommended it to the favorable consideration of the House.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I think this proviso is an attempt at new legislation in an appropriation bill for an extension of a corporation which is not warranted, and therefore is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The objection of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] would have been good if taken in time; but it is made too late.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Then I hope the House will vote to strike out this proviso, for it is clearly out of order.

Mr. DAVIS. I recollect when, during the last session of Congress, the law was so altered as to increase the amount of compensation which this gas company was to receive. From the knowledge which I then had, and from all the information I have since obtained, I think that the change in the law was entirely just. And I will add to that a statement I have received from responsible parties that the losses sustained by that company before relief was obtained were so great that to-day they are indebted more than $70,000, which they have not the means to pay.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. For what can the stock be now bought?

Mr. DAVIS. I do not know, I never owned a share of it, and never had any interest in it. There was some stock owned by orphans which was sold before the law of last session was passed, and it was sold for fifty per cent. of its cost, although it was the only stock the orphans had. They sold it, because they despaired of any relief being afforded by Congress.

But I do object to this proviso in this bill, for I doubt whether there is any propriety in Congress adding to the chartered powers of a corporation in an appropriation bill.

The amendment of Mr. SCHENCK was then adopted.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I move to amend the clause relating to taking up and relaying the brick pavements near the War and Navy Departments, by inserting after the word "relaying," the words "with stone flagging."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question in relation to the paragraph making an appropriation to enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the expenses of transporting convicts to State prisons. Under what law was the Secretary of the Interior authorized to select places elsewhere than the prison at Albany, New York?

Mr. STEVENS. He has the right to select any prison. He has found Albany to be the best place and he sends them there.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to strike out the lines two hundred and fifty, two hundred and fifty-one, and two hundred and fifty-two of this bill in relation to collections of certain expeditions. I do not see why it should require $4,000 to preserve these collections. They are already in a good state of preservation, and if they are minerals they will not spoil.

Mr. STEVENS. This is a provision which we were to have made a year ago, when they were putting these collections in order. It is not for a future but for a past expenditure. It was supposed to be important that these collections should be preserved, and I should be very sorry to have the House strike this out.

The motion to strike out was not agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I am instructed by the committee to move the following amendment to come after line three hundred and fifty-two:

Office of Attorney General:

For deficiency in appropriations for salaries in act of March 3, 1865, $3,300.

For deficiencies in appropriations for contingent expenses, $1,500.

For pay of two temporary clerks from January 1 to June 30, 1866, $1,200.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to know how these deficiencies happened. What right had they to expend this money without authority of law?

Mr. KASSON. The act referred to in the amendment was passed after the regular appropriations for the year had been made. In consequence of the increase of business, that act increased the salary of the Assistant Attorney General and certain clerks allowed to the Department. This appropriation is necessary to carry out that law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move to amend by inserting after line three hundred and seventy-eight, on page 17, the following:

Provided, That in the purchase of carpets for any of the public buildings or offices under any appropriations herein provided, they shall be of domestic manufacture.

Mr. Chairman, I think that we have gone far enough in the purchase of foreign carpets for our public buildings and offices. We have bought fully enough of such carpets for this Chamber. It is time that we should manifest some disposition to encourage in this respect American manufactures. I believe that we should now declare by our legislation that American carpets are good enough for the servants of the people to tread upon. It seems to me that we should long ago have inaugurated a reform in this respect.

Mr. KASSON. I have only to say that in reporting the appropriation embraced in this paragraph, it was not the intention of the Committee on Appropriations to include anything for carpets; and I am afraid that this proviso, if adopted, will occasion a necessity for an additional item in a deficiency bill next year.

Mr. GRINNELL. I have only to say, in reply to my colleague, that the bill does mention carpets; and therefore the amendment is proper.

Mr. KASSON. As an amendment to the preceding paragraphs of the bill, it would be out of order. I supposed that it was offered as an amendment to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. It is only in order as an amendment to the pending paragraph.

Mr. GRINNELL. I had the sanction of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in presenting this amendment, and I supposed that of course it was in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the amendment as an amendment to the pending paragraph. Does the gentleman insist upon the amendment?

Mr. GRINNELL. I do, most certainly.

On agreeing to the amendment, there were, on a division—ayes 30, noes 34; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. GRINNELL, and Mr. WASHBURN of Illinois.

The committee rose; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 40.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 86) making additional appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1866, and for other purposes, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

The hour of half past four o'clock p. m. having arrived, the House, agreeably to order, took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. ROLLINS occupying the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The House, agreeably to order, resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the President's annual message.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. NEWELL. Mr. Speaker, I propose to submit some remarks upon the annual message of the President of the United States.

I may premise that my acquaintance with the President extends back nearly twenty years, when associated with him as a member of this body. We sat upon opposite sides of this Chamber, and seldom voted together; but I honored him and all his associates honored him as the advocate of progress, the friend of humanity, the able and uncompromising champion of the right of man to the fruits of his labor, and to the possession of so much of the unoccupied public domain as that labor could cultivate. I knew and honored him as the defender of all those rights which underlie the Declaration of Independence as living principles, pregnant with a meaning and an interpretation which he has lived to see accorded to them by many who in that day professed to regard them only as "glittering generalities." I have known him since that time as faithful among the faithless in the desperate ordeal through which we have passed, giving unmistakable testimony of fealty to the cause of liberty and the Union. Persecuted, defamed, plundered, driven from his home and family, hunted like a beast of prey, he upheld the cause of his country and bade defiance to the armed legions of treason and death. For all these the Union party elevated him to the place he occupies. For all these he has my confidence to-day, and I do not believe, as many would have us believe, that he will prove unfaithful to the great trust confided to his keeping. He may differ from Congress as to the particular method of reconstructing the Union; but I appeal to the debates and actions of the Senate and this House, as well as to the people and press of the country, and ask if there is unanimity anywhere on this most important matter. On the great questions of the preservation of the Government and the freedom and elevation of mankind he is eminently sound and consistent. There is no material difference on vital points between him and ourselves; none that may not be speedily adjusted by conference and conciliation. To denounce him as a traitor who, hand to hand, has throttled treason to the death; to brand him as a usurper whose whole energies have been devoted to the welfare and improvement of his race is to utter a malignant libel upon mankind. Sir, having so well fulfilled the varied duties of his life, let us not reproach and distrust him without cause, but rather sustain him in all just and reasonable measures, and leave the result to Him who guides the destinies of nations.

There are many subjects, Mr. Speaker, in the excellent message before us to which I would like to advert, but time will not permit, and I shall therefore confine my remarks to the question which so properly engrosses so large a share of our attention as well as that of the whole country—the reconstruction of the Union.

The nature and character of the Government are such as to constitute it an anomaly in the family of nations. It represents the solidarity of the States combined with an individuality of each as respects all matters and powers not delegated to the General Government, which leaves it perfectly free and untrammelled in its appropriate sphere. It represents, in fact, in a community of nations that freedom of action which in a community of people is compatible with the greatest good of the body politic. As the latter is the highest type of individual existence in the social state, so the former is the most perfect representative of a community of nations having one paramount object and principle, namely, the greatest amount of individual national liberty compatible with the collective national security. It was evidently foreseen by the fathers of the Constitution that it behooved them to restrain on the one hand a too great latitude of individual State authority and action, and on the other a too great concentration of national power. Thus the Constitution gave to the States collectively the right to make war or declare peace; to impose taxes on imports; to create and maintain a standing Army and Navy; to dispose of the public lands; to regulate commerce between the States; to naturalize foreigners; to accredit to and receive ambassadors from foreign Powers; and to do certain other acts specified in the Constitution. To the States were left certain rights, powers, and duties, principally pertaining to local government, and having reference to matters which it was acknowledged they were better capable of supervising and regulating. The Constitution seeks to make the States sovereign in their sphere of duties and the national Government supreme in its sphere. In carrying out these ideas the framers found a difficult and delicate task.

From the organization of the Government to the present day it has been a subject of debate and discussion at all periods, giving rise, more or less, to bitter partisan strife and sectional animosity, which finally culminated in the late gigantic rebellion against the authority of the national Government and the Union of the States composing it. And in this connection I might add that history has been repeating itself in the case of that of our own country. The party strifes and revolutions, the contest for power in all nations, have been produced by the collisions of those who would strengthen the central power on the one hand, and those who would weaken it on the other. The history of Rome, from the earliest period to the time when power was almost entirely concentrated in the person of the emperors, is nothing but the record of such a contest, which had its beginning in the birth of the nation, its culmination in the period of its highest prosperity, and its end in its era of decay and dissolution. The aim of the fathers was to preserve such a happy mean between the concentration and diffusion of power that this contest should be reduced to its minimum of virulence, and that thus those violent collisions, political and revolutionary, which had marked the history of the world from the earliest period, should be so mitigated as not to endanger national safety and individual freedom. The combined wisdom of these patriotic men produced our present Constitution. It is a noble monument to their ability; but, unfortunately, like all human instruments, it was imperfectly constructed, not because the theory was wrong, but because of the existence in the country of an institution so contrary to the genius of free government, and to the very principles upon which the Constitution itself was founded, that it was impossible to incorporate it into the organic law so that the latter could be preserved free from its contaminating influence. It was as if the surgeon were to inoculate the living healthy body with the virus of a loathsome disease. The result would certainly be that a contest for dominion between health and disease would be produced, in which life or death would eventually triumph.

The framers of the Constitution did what they considered best under the circumstances. They made freedom the rule and slavery the exception in the organization of the Government. They declared in favor of the former in language the most emphatic and sublime in history, while they placed the latter, as they fondly hoped, in a position favorable for ultimate extinction. Indeed, they so worded the organic act itself that slavery was decided to be so abhorrent to the sentiment of justice, liberty, and common humanity as to render it utterly unworthy to be named therein. I have before said that the fathers intended to organize a Government in which freedom should be the rule and slavery the exception. The whole drift of their action was toward such a consummation; and for years the tendency of the social life and industry of the people was to the same end. State after State abolished slavery, until finally the free predominated over the slave States in numbers and population. Slavery was driven toward a particular section of the country, where the cultivation of the cotton plant rendered it so profitable and at the same time constituted it such a monopoly in the hands of a few powerful, wealthy, talented, and ambitious men as to make it an element of political power and engine of ambitious designs so as to render its existence incompatible with individual liberty and national safety. Indeed, in such gigantic proportions did this institution loom up on the political horizon that the declaration, "this country cannot exist half slave and half free," burst from the lips of two of our leading statesmen as if forced from them in the agony produced by a contemplation of our political future. But it was not so much these men as the good men and true of the country speaking through them who uttered at that time words which were prophetic of the consummation which was so near at hand that for the first time prophecy blended itself with history. Yes, for the first time in the history of the world the prophet became the chief actor in the events which he foretold, even to the extent of sealing with his life the book which, under the direction of an overruling Providence, he was selected to open.

Thus, instead, as the fathers intended, of freedom being the rule and slavery the exception, on account of the encroachments of this institution, and the ambitious designs of those who used it as an engine of political power, there was danger that slavery would become the rule and freedom the exception. It aspired to make every department of the Government subservient to itself and its interests. It poisoned also the social life of the people, undermined their belief in self-government, weakened their faith in the principle on which the Government was founded, the principle of universal suffrage; in fine, it had so succeeded in debauching the conscience of a large mass of the people as to render them fit tools in the hands of men who were determined that slavery should rule the country or that they would dissolve the Union.

And so this Constitution of our fathers, because of the existence of an element foreign to its genius and principles, flatly subversive of the ideas on which it was founded, and which gave the lie direct to its declaration of rights, was in such danger of utter destruction that the patriotic people of the nation found themselves compelled to abandon it altogether as theegis of their liberty and safety or take up arms in its defense. This latter alternative was taken, and the result was that the contest so long waged between individual State liberty and national security was finally and forever decided by the ultima ratio of nations and of war.

For years the contest between the doctrines represented by Thomas Jefferson on the one hand, and Alexander Hamilton on the other, convulsed the country. The State-rights men demanded one concession after another in favor of slavery. It was at one time the right to capture and to aid in capture; at another, the right to carry into Territories; at another, the right of passage through and domicile in the States; at another, the principle that the Constitution carried it everywhere, and at all times; and finally, the culminating right, that of secession from the Union in order to build up a confederation of which it was to be the chief cornerstone. Jefferson's idea of State rights was simply the conservation of individual and State rights. The idea of the latter-day pretended followers of Jefferson was that State rights was the liberty given to one man to oppress his fellow, and that no power, not even the central authority itself, could intervene to shield the oppressed. This was the degeneration of a great principle of individual liberty, subordinated to social welfare, to the principle of the pirate or the robber who regards no law but brute force. And such a degeneration only showed that State rights, as understood by these bad men, had passed outside and beyond the pale of civilization itself, and thus became inimical not only to the people, but actually menaced the national unity.

But, indeed, when the national authority found itself unable to protect the liberties of the people, it not only failed in the first principles of its organization, but degenerated into an instrument of oppression. The form of the original instrument, it is true, remained, but under the modern interpretation of the principle of State rights the soul which had originally animated it had long since departed. So that the contest between the so-called advocates of State rights, which had convulsed the nation more or less from its foundation, culminated in armed rebellion against the central authority, leaving the friends of a Government founded on the natural rights of a people and universal justice no other alternative but to defend with the sword that which they had so long and so nobly contended for with the tongue and pen. I consequently, then, regard this contest as much closed by the late war as that which for years preceded the Revolution was closed by the triumph of our arms at that period. As the country entered upon a new era at the close of the Revolution, so it enters upon a new era now. The Revolution settled the great principle that representation should follow taxation, and that so far as all men in these United States were concerned, this principle was true in theory but not in practice, and this because slavery existed as a disturbing element at that time. The result of the rebellion has made this principle for which the fathers fought not only true in theory but true in practice. The rebellion commenced in a desire either to destroy this Union or to decide that the principle for which the fathers fought for was applicable only to white men. It ended in the defeat and disgrace of the men who upheld and fought for this principle and the triumph of those who opposed it. During the contest, and while it was yet in doubt, it was found necessary to make the principles of the Declaration of Independence and of the Constitution practically as well as theoretically true by the elevation of the exceptional race to the status of free citizens. This was done, and the race was called upon to aid in the struggle, and they nobly responded to the appeal. They not only helped to win their own liberty, but aided to preserve ours.

The result of the rebellion, then, having made the principles of the Constitution not only theoretically but practically true, it is our duty to see that the principles of the Constitution are now carried out to the fullest extent of the idea of the framers; to have them carried out so as to embrace "all men" as truly as the fathers embraced them ideally, and would have embraced them truly but for the existence of slavery at that time. In doing this the country takes a new departure in the course toward the goal of universal freedom, and with the noble motto, "Equal and exact justice to all men," inscribed upon its escutcheon, stands forth, in the presence of all nations, thoroughly purged from every impurity. Founded upon the rock of true republicanism, "universal suffrage," in the ages to come the waves of death and darkness may beat against it, but shall beat in vain.

From the very nature of republicanism, as understood by the fathers, freedom and suffrage are concomitant, twin sisters, inseparable, mutually dependent on each other for support and existence. Suffrage follows freedom as light follows the rising of the sun. It is by the ballot-box that freedom is upheld and perpetuated. Take away that sacred right of republican government, and you leave the people no means for the redress of grievances but those of revolution. You compel those who are denied this right to resort to force in order to obtain them. Indeed, universal suffrage is to such an extent the distinguishing feature of republican institutions that our people, from the highest to the lowest, our statesmen, our judges, and our journalists, have continually justified revolution in any nation of the Old World in which the right of suffrage is either denied to the great mass of the people or so abridged as to be practically a nullity. During the well-known Dorr rebellion of Rhode Island, indeed, I well remember that the Democratic journals of the country, almost without exception, justified the rebels on the ground that the constitution and laws of that State left the majority of the people no other alternative save revolution, because it denied the right of suffrage. Now, how can we stand up in the presence of the despotisms of the Old World and justify their oppressed people for waging war against a tyranny which exists in a more offensive and oppressive manner among ourselves? In most of the despotic nations of the globe a man may, by acquiring property, by performing some signal service to the State, or by some other means, place himself in the governing class; but in the United States, under our Constitution, as interpreted by certain politicians and statesmen, a large class of the people are forever excluded from the rights of freemen, from ever becoming a part and parcel of the people of the United States. Judge Taney, in the celebrated Dred Scott case, declares that no State has a right to make a citizen of the United States:

"The Constitution, upon its adoption, obviously took from the States all power, by any subsequent legislation, to introduce as a citizen into the political family of the United States any one, no matter where he was born, or what might be his character or condition."

Now, the question arises, what constitutes the political family of the United States? Why, certainly those born to the soil; those who pay taxes for the support of the Government; those who are called upon to bear arms in its defense against insurrection at home and against the public enemy abroad. Every man, then, who is not an alien who refuses allegiance to the Government comes under this category; and to the extent that you abridge or deny the right of citizenship, to that extent you violate the principles of the Constitution of the United States and the Declaration of Independence, which are based on those principles. Democratic interpreters of the Constitution claim that a State may make or unmake a citizen of the United States, and limit or deny him the suffrage. I deny this. A State may regulate and control the suffrage so as to prevent frauds, and for the convenience of voting, but it cannot take from one citizen of the United States within its borders that which it allows to another. Again I quote from Judge Taney's opinion in the Dred Scott case. He says:

"And if persons of the African race are citizens of a State and of the United States they would be entitled to all of those privileges and immunities in every State, and the State could not restrict them, for they would hold those privileges and immunities under the paramount authority of the Federal Government; and its courts would be bound to maintain and enforce them, the constitution and the laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding. And if the States could limit or restrict them, or place the party in an inferior grade, this clause of the Constitution would be meaningless, and could have no operation, and would give no rights to the citizen when in another State. He would have none but what the State itself chose to allow him."

Now, Mr. Speaker, admitting, for the sake of the argument, that at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, as Judge Taney claimed, the African was enslaved and subject, at the present day this is not the case. There is in this country now no subject or enslaved race. No foot of a slave or subject pollutes our soil. We are sovereign people. The constitutional amendment has elevated all the people into what? Is it into a distinct class, separate and defined by metes and bounds, or is it into the only class we or the Constitution recognize—the people of the United States? Certainly it is the latter class, and if it is, then they are citizens of the United States, possessing all the rights and immunities of such. Again I quote Judge Taney, who says:

"The words 'people of the United States' and 'citizens' are synonymous terms, and mean the same thing."

But he also says that no State can restrict the privileges and immunities of a citizen of the United States. I have shown that among those privileges and immunities the right of suffrage is the most sacred of all. It is, in fact, the ark of the covenant that overshadows, covers, and protects with its sacred wings every other right, civil as well as political. Take it away, and you take away the power of conserving and protecting all the rest. I cannot conclude but that freedom and suffrage are inseparable in our political system, just as people and citizens are synonymous terms in our Constitution. Every attribute of a truly republican government confirms this, and every departure from this principle testifies to our want of faith in the ability of the people to be sovereigns, and of a growing belief in the doctrine that the government of the select few, is more preferable and more in accordance with right, justice, and humanity than the government of the entire mass. Because, and only because, the African people were an enslaved and subject race at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, they had no right that the white man was bound to respect. The emancipation proclamation has removed the badge of servitude from off their necks, but does not in any word limit the freedom into which they have been introduced. On the contrary, it is provided that Congress shall have the power to carry out that freedom to the fullest extent. The old Roman acts of emancipation, previous to the period of imperial rule, limited the status of freedmen. The emperors abolished that limit, and the freedman when emancipated became at once a citizen. Our act of emancipation neither limits nor defines the status of the freedman. It elevates him at once into the ranks of the people. It casts him into the great mass with all disabilities removed and all political and civil rights granted him. The State that dares to limit or abridge or deprive him, altogether of those rights, violates the Constitution of the United States, and in so doing commits a high crime against the authority of that instrument as well as against the sovereignty of the people.

It may not be wise to extend this high prerogative of a citizen, the elective franchise, to that large class of people who have so recently become free; indeed, I fully agree with those who claim that it would be best to withhold it until they become more accustomed to think and act for themselves, and attain a degree of knowledge and intelligence necessary to a proper appreciation of that attribute of citizenship. But I see no way of escape from the force of truth and inevitable logic of the conclusion that freedom and citizenship carry with them, pari passu, the right of suffrage.

I have endeavored to show, Mr. Speaker, that in the foundation of the Government the people of all the States agreed that, in order to a more perfect Union for the sake of ourselves and our posterity, the States should give up certain rights that would otherwise inhere in them to the United States or new nation about to be formed. Among these rights were virtually the inherent rights of sovereignty, namely, the right to make war and declare peace, the right of citizenship to the extent that said citizenship should be uniform throughout the Union and regulated by Congress. Thus the right of naturalization was declared to be a right of the new nation, while all the people of the United States were declared to be citizens thereof; and thus the citizens of any one State in the Union were given "the right to enter every State whenever they pleased." I again quote from Judge Taney's opinion in the Dred Scott case, "singly or in companies, without pass or passport and without obstruction, to sojourn there as long as they pleased, to go where they pleased at every hour of the day or night, without molestation, unless they committed some violation of the law." In fact, the Confederacy was changed into a great nation based upon the will of the whole people, and subject to such laws as would conserve the general weal. Certain modes of procedure were also laid down for altering or amending the Constitution, but nowhere do we find provision made for the secession of a State from the national Confederation; on the contrary, the idea of the framers evidently was, that as national unity was necessary to national safety and individual liberty, so every possible means was taken to preserve that unity for themselves and their posterity. The Constitution declares that Congress shall guaranty to every State a republican form of government. Now, suppose the majority in any one State decide in favor of a monarchical or despotic government, this is practically carrying out the right of secession, for such a government is incompatible with the Union of these States. In view of the formation of such a government, the minority in that State could appeal to the Congress of the United States for protection, and Congress would be compelled to intervene in order to vindicate the Constitution of the United States and the principle of universal suffrage on which it is founded. The duty devolving upon the United States of guarantying a republican government to the citizens of every State is one of the strongest evidences that the secession of a State was never contemplated by the fathers; but, on the contrary, the paramount duty of the Government was to preserve the liberty of the citizen, whether menaced by insurrection or despotism by the States or any confederation of them, or by any enemy from abroad.

Indeed, the contingency which rendered intervention necessary to preserve the liberty of the people has occurred in our day, and was caused not by any despotic act of the central authority itself, but by the attempt of an oligarchy based on the right of man to hold property in man, through the perversion of the doctrine of State rights, to trample on the liberties of the people and extinguish them forever under the worst despotism in all the annals of history. The right of a State to secede, then, is found to be incompatible with the principle of universal suffrage, and the fathers seeing that it might, and no doubt would, endanger it, so worded the organic act as to decree a perpetual Union for the purpose of perpetuating liberty with it. Liberty and union, one and inseparable, was inscribed on their banner; and their sons during the late rebellion have held it aloft amid scenes of blood and carnage such as the world had never previously witnessed. After such a contest, and such a triumphant termination thereto, is it possible that any true patriot can for a moment doubt that the idea of the fathers transmitted to their children became in them an article of political faith, so deeply engraven in their hearts and consciences that all the demoniacal powers of a despotism could not prevail to undermine or destroy it? It was this faith that sustained us through the late bloody struggle against the enemies of human rights. It is this faith in liberty and union that will always prove a wall of fire against any similar assaults in the future.

But, Mr. Speaker, the enemies of this Union and this liberty are still insidiously at work. They still talk of State rights and State sovereignty. But still, as before, with them State rights means the right of an oligarchy to deprive the people of their liberties, to say that a citizen of the United States shall not be entitled to the privileges and immunities of the citizens of each State. This is the real animus of State rights; and secession means the determination to enforce the dogma outside the protectingegis of the Constitution, if they cannot do so within. We respect Rome, because she protected her citizens in all the provinces of her vast dominion, even the most remote. Saul of Tarsus, though a Jew, appealed to her for protection from the lash, and his appeal was heard. We admire Great Britain, because she also protects her citizens, and allows no State to make exceptive laws discriminating against them. But are we to deny to an American citizen, one of the sovereign people of our free Government, that supreme right of protection which despotic Governments are so careful to accord to their subjects or their slaves? We do deny this supreme right to our citizens when we acknowledge that a State can secede from the Union and thus deprive its citizens of that support and protection, of those rights of sovereign citizenship, to confirm and preserve which the Union itself was formed, and formed for no other purpose.

As regards the dogma of State suicide, so ably set forth by Mr. STEVENS and others, I cannot indorse it consistently with these views. A State may, by alteration or amendment of its organic act, place itself in a position that puts it without the pale of republican government. It still remains a State, however, subject to the Constitution, and Congress is bound to see that the penalties, if not privileges, of that instrument are visited upon it. It thus remains a State for correction and amendment, in order that its citizens, who are at the same time citizens of the United States, may be protected in their rights and privileges, at least that portion of them who continue true to their allegiance to the Constitution and the Union. The Constitution provides no way for the secession of a State from the Union, and no State having been taken out by the war it is plain that these States lately in rebellion have never been out, and are consequently still in the Union. The question whether it is in or out, theoretically, is not so important as the question of restoration, and that is the question with which we are now called upon to deal. It is a most important question, because that upon it depends the restoration and perpetuation of the Union.

And in approaching this question the first consideration should be the fitness of the late so-called seceded States to renew their allegiance to the Union. This fitness depends on, first, their loyalty to the Constitution; secondly, their loyalty to human rights, the rights and privileges of every citizen thereof. As regards loyalty to the Union, we should be satisfied that they will repudiate all their debts incurred in the prosecution of the late war; and on the other hand respect the debts contracted by us in putting down the rebellion. This would be such a practical exhibition of loyalty as to fully satisfy the Union man most doubtful as to the honesty of their future. True, this has virtually been repudiated by the collapse of the rebellion itself, but it remains a source of alarm to our loyal people and an engine of mischief with which demagogues may yet play to the injury of the country and its institutions.

Mr. Speaker, when the States lately in rebellion shall send loyal Representatives here, and when I see evidences of a desire on the part of the people to do justly and love mercy, and to walk as becomes members of a Christian republican commonwealth, I shall rejoice to admit them to the full and perfect rights and privileges of which they have by their own folly been deprived.

From some of the States lately in insurrection members have been elected to this Congress against whom not even a suspicion of disloyalty can be breathed. On the contrary, they are noble and worthy men who have periled all, property, family connections, and life itself, in the cause of the Union. The States which they represent having fulfilled the conditions of admission understood by all to have been imposed upon them after the suppression of the rebellion, are entitled to representation by loyal men. I think in the cases of all of these States and of these loyal Representatives, the committee on reconstruction should report immediately and favorably. But at any rate, Mr. Speaker, the committee, having a proper sense of what is due to the intelligence, honor, and dignity of this House, should make a report setting forth its reasons for the exclusion of these States and their loyal Representatives. In that case we could act understandingly, and with all the lights on this subject before us. Such a report would also tend to greatly relieve the suspense and anxiety under which the country labors respecting the great questions of reconstruction and pacification of the Union.

I admit that on account of the factious conduct of the South, which, since the defeat of the great rebel armies in the field, has in many States been increasing rather than diminishing in virulence, a state of war virtually exists in the greater portion of that section; but in those States in which such a condition of things does not prevail, would it not be well to admit members by districts upon proper scrutiny of their antecedents? Indeed, is not this a legal mode of admitting members to seats in this House? The States are represented in the Senate and the people in the House of Representatives, whose members are elected by districts. If a State is not or cannot be fully represented, there is no reason that it should not be represented at all. Pennsylvania to-day is not fully represented, having but twenty-three instead of twenty-four members on this floor, in consequence of a contest for the representation in the sixteenth district. Because that district is not represented, shall we disfranchise the entire State? So it is with some of these States lately in rebellion. Take the case of Tennessee. It has established a loyal government. It stands by the Union to-day as firmly and steadfastly as Maryland, Missouri, or Kentucky. Tennessee was admitted to a seat in the last national Union convention, and one of her sons was selected for the Vice Presidency, and I can see no reason why its loyal Representatives shall be excluded here. Shall we exclude the noble Maynard and others of his colleagues because one or more of the Representatives may present so disloyal a record as to prevent their admission? These are certainly questions for the House to consider, and I respectfully urge the committee on reconstruction to report upon them, so that we may take the necessary action in so important a matter.

And while upon the subject of the reconstruction and readmission of the States, permit me to say a few words regarding amendments to the Constitution. I am opposed to all unnecessary and sweeping amendments of that instrument. They have a tendency to subvert insidiously our form of government, and to beget a want of reverence for the Constitution, which will finally make it subject to the sport of every wind of doctrine and the object of demagogical assaults, the most dangerous not only to our liberty, but to the stability of the Government. I am especially opposed to the proposition to elect the President directly by the popular vote. Such a proposition would tend to make the Government a consolidated democracy, which would as surely lapse into a consolidated despotism under the rule of some great military chieftain, or of some representative of sectional interest overriding State authority and State individuality. To preserve, as I have heretofore endeavored to show, State individuality in accordance with national unity, was the great purpose and labor of the fathers. Such an amendment, in my opinion, would sooner or later overthrow the first, and convert the second into an unmitigated despotism.

Before closing I am constrained to notice a statement made the other day by my colleague from the fourth district, [Mr. ROGERS], so aptly designated yesterday by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] as the "leader of the Opposition," who, I regret, is not now in his seat, when delivering his very able speech upon the constitutional amendment, then before the House, which, unexplained, places our State in a false position, which I believe he did not intend. He stated that New Jersey "had sent no colored troops to the war." It is true that New Jersey sent no organized colored troops to the field, and for a reason well known to my friend and to the people of our State, but she did send many gallant negro soldiers—not a few of them from my own town—who were obliged to secure admission in organizations in Pennsylvania and Rhode Island. They fought well, and deserve the commendation of their State and country. Some of them found an honorable death, and to-day their bones bleach on the plains of Louisiana or lie buried in the bloody trenches of Petersburg and Richmond.

Mr. Speaker, New Jersey has never faltered, in any regard, in her obligations to the Government nor in her devotion to the Union. Her sons, imbuing their patriotism upon the gory fields of the Revolution, sent forth men and money freely as her waters course to the ocean. The seventy-nine thousand five hundred and eleven soldiers and sailors—besides many furnished to adjoining States—with the millions of her treasure expended in the war, furnish the most fitting reply to those who malign her patriotism or impugn her loyalty. Her sons fell on every field, the foremost in the fight, and were ever counted the bravest of the brave. She gave such men as Kearney, Bavard, the Taylors, Allen, Tucker, Ryerson, Zabriskei, Jaueway, Hatch, Vredenburg, Haines, and Arrowsmith, with thousands of other braves, counting them a fitting sacrifice to place upon the altar of liberty; and she cherishes their memories as a priceless heritage.

Mr. Speaker, the late gigantic rebellion having been subdued and the armies thereof utterly routed and dispersed, it is but natural that our people should turn with beaming eyes and grateful hearts to the heroic Union soldiers and sailors who have so nobly periled their all in defense of their country. Never shall their great deeds be forgotten. Forever shall the memory of our gallant dead be embalmed in the hearts of the living. On the banks of many a southern river; under the spreading foliage of many a southern forest tree; on the hillside and in the valleys of the South are the tens of thousands of those grassy mounds which mark the last resting-places of the noble Union dead. In many a northern home the widow and the orphan, the brother and the sister, the bereaved father and the disconsolate mother, await the footfall on the step without, that so often in the past had been the sweetest music to their ears, but await it in vain. Never more on this earth shall the form of that brave boy who proudly stepped from his father's door to take his place in the Union column as it filed past, be clasped again to that father's heart. Never more shall a mother's kiss be pressed upon his brow as he sleeps in his little cot, in the humble chamber of the old homestead:

"He has fought his last fight, he has won his last battle.

No sound shall awake him to glory again."

But in the grateful heart of a redeemed nation should his memory and the memory of his glorious death be enshrined as long as our mountains lift their heads to the heavens and our rivers bear the waters of the continent to the sea. Let it be our chiefest care to see that the survivors of this momentous and appalling strife be the objects of a nation's solicitude and a nation's care. Failing in not only our duty but our gratitude to these men, we fail in one of the noblest attributes of a nation—that sovereign attribute of justice to those who have helped to save it from destruction. And this justice includes the right of these men to equal bounties and equal pay as well as the right when incapacitated by sickness or wounds from earning their daily bread to a comfortable maintenance from the Government. Thus, fulfilling all our duties, protecting all who need protection, fostering the weak, and giving the strong every possible opportunity to build up the waste places of the land, let us so conduct our affairs as not only to attract to our nation the admiring eyes of the world at large, but to draw down upon it the approving smile of Almighty God.

And now, Mr. Speaker, unmindful of all consequences to ourselves, individually, but impressed with our responsibility to all mankind, casting our vision beyond the present and into the far distant future, let us endeavor to reestablish this Government upon the enduring principle of "equal and exact justice to all men," and to lay its foundations deep and broad upon the eternal rock of liberty and a perpetual Union. So shall our beloved country, healed of her wounds, and disenthralled from the enchantment which has bound her for a hundred years, spring into a new existence, to exceed in grandeur and greatness the wildest visions of the patriot fathers, and her banner, planted high upon the everlasting hills of truth and justice, and illuminated by the sun of freedom, shall become a beacon to the oppressed children of men who shall come hitherward and find a refuge and a heritage for themselves and their children, and their children's children, till time shall be no more.

Mr. STROUSE. Mr. Speaker, in discussing the important question of the reconstruction of the States lately in rebellion, a subject which not only agitates Congress but the whole people of our country, I am aware that I find little countenance or sympathy from the majority of this House. But this will not deter me, as the Representative of one of the largest and most conservative districts in Pennsylvania, from giving my views upon a subject fraught with consequences involving the stability or downfall of our democratic system of government. The writings and speeches of public men received but little attention during the progress of the war. The public mind was excited; the public pulse was fevered; a vigorous prosecution of the war was demanded, and the almost unanimous prayer for victory to the Union arms and a restoration of peace was heard throughout the middle and western States. Victory at last perched on our banners. The rebels laid down their arms, acknowledged their defeat and complete failure of their attempted severance of our grand Confederation of States.

For four long years we continued a struggle so fierce, so desperate, and so bloody, that the civilized world was appalled, and the statesmen of Europe stood aghast at a spectacle unparalleled in the history of civilization and warfare. Brother was arrayed against brother! There stood the father pitted in deadly combat against the son! One million brave men consigned to untimely graves! The fields of the South whitened with the bones of the slain! Sadness and mourning brought to thousands of firesides! The public finances deranged; an enormous national debt created, with its burden of taxation entailed upon generations unborn. In addition to all this, the people have patiently borne grievances innumerable. The patriotic citizens, who sincerely loved their country and who opposed every effort at dismemberment of the Union, bore up submissively under all the impositions of power and violations of law—organic, statute, and local—for the sole and only purpose of preserving the Republic as it was established and founded by the heroes and sages of 1776.

In the month of April, 1865, through the bravery and heroism of our Army and Navy, the terrible contest was brought to a close. The rebels surrendered and disbanded their armies.

"Grim-visaged war has smoothed his wrinkled front."

"The war is over," was upon every tongue. The people assembled in town meetings, and gave vent to their feelings by the ringing of bells; bonfires were made, and other demonstrations of joy at the return of sweet, smiling, blessed peace. The religious community of all denominations assembled in their houses of worship and prayed and thanked most devoutly to Almighty God for the restoration of peace to our unhappy country, and that—

"Every man shall eat in safety
Under his own vine what he plants, and sing
The merry songs of peace to all his neighbors."

President Lincoln, only a day or two before his most diabolical assassination, announced to the rejoicing multitude in this city and to the country that peace had dawned upon us, and the glorious banner of the Union would again wave over our whole country.

The rejoicing at the cessation of hostilities and the return of peace was not confined to the North, but even in the States lately in revolt, many "good men and true," even of those who from compulsion and local pride had taken up arms against the Federal Government and the entirety of the Union, were glad that the unnatural and bloody strife was at an end. What were the expectations of the people at that time? What did our constituents demand of us, and what do they demand now of us, their Representatives, who have solemnly sworn to preserve and protect the Constitution? Do they want us or ask us to treat the eleven southern States as conquered Territories, and the ten million white people living therein as a conquered nation, a foreign country held by the iron grasp of conquest, and the people as subjects or vassals? No such demand is made by the people, the honest yeomanry of the great middle, western, and border States. Whatever the ideas of fanatics may be in other localities, whose motto has ever been, "Rule or ruin," certain it is that the great mass of American citizens, native and adopted, desire no arbitrary or tyrannical measures or acts on the part of their servants against the fallen and poverty-stricken people of the South. We can afford to be magnanimous. We have been victorious, and should not, and cannot, constitutionally or legally, act the part of oppressors against a brave but now submissive people. Mr. Speaker, let me not be misunderstood. I am not, and never have been, the defender of secession, or of any movement or act having a tendency to affect the Union of the States.

On the contrary, I have from the beginning opposed secession and disunion in every form. As a Representative of the people in the Congress of the United States I denounced secession as a crime most wicked and monstrous. While I deny the right of any State to secede from the Federal Union under any circumstances, I decidedly combat the idea that the southern States or any of them ever were out of the Union, or had lost their places in the Confederation of States. The Union was formed by the States, hence the title, the United States. Each one of the old colonial thirteen States ratified the Constitution of their own Union in their capacity of sovereign States, and by this act of ratification became the constituent parts of the Union. It requires no argument to show that the acts or ordinances of secession of Virginia, South Carolina, or any of the southern States, were utterly void and invalid, and that neither the State nor the people thereof were affected thereby. Notwithstanding the fact that the powers of the General and State Governments were suspended for a time on account of the usurpation by those in revolt in those States, yet de jure the States never ceased to be a part of the Union, and the people subject to the Constitution and the laws of the United States. President Johnson, in his excellent and patriotic message to this Congress very truly says:

"States, with proper limitations of power, are essential to the existence of the Constitution of the United States. At the very commencement, when we assumed a place among the Powers of the earth, the Declaration of Independence was adopted by States; so also were the Articles of Confederation: and when 'the people of the United States' ordained and established the Constitution, it was the assent of the States, one by one, which gave it vitality. In the event, too, of any amendment to the Constitution, the proposition of Congress needs the confirmation of States. Without States, one great branch of the legislative government would be wanting. And if we look beyond the letter of the Constitution to the character of our country, its capacity for comprehending within its jurisdiction a vast continental empire is due to the system of States. The best security for the perpetual existence of the States is the 'supreme authority' of the Constitution of the United States. The perpetuity of the Constitution brings with it the perpetuity of the States: their mutual relation makes us what we are, and in our political system their connection is indissoluble. The whole cannot exist without the parts, nor the parts without the whole. So long as the Constitution of the United States endures, the States will endure; the destruction of the one is the destruction of the other; the preservation of the one is the preservation of the other."

For the enunciation of the sound truths contained in his message the President is attacked and aspersed by the radical leaders and their small followers, because he is determined to stand firmly by the landmarks of the Constitution, and refuses to become a traitor by aiding in the obliteration of eleven States and degrading the white inhabitants by making them the political inferior of the negroes. President Johnson has been most consistent in his course on the momentous questions that have agitated this country for the last five years. After his nomination for Vice-President, in a speech made at Nashville on the 10th of June, 1864, he held the following language:

"So far as the head of the ticket is concerned, the Baltimore convention had said, not only to the United States, but to all nations of the earth, that we are determined to maintain and carry out the principles of free government. [Applause.] That convention announced and confirmed a principle not to be disregarded. It was that the right of secession and the power of a State to place itself out of the Union are not recognized. The convention had declared this principle by its action. Tennessee had been in rebellion against the Government, and waged a treasonable war against its authority, just as other southern States had done. She had seceded just as much as other States had, and left the Union as far as she had the power to do so. Nevertheless the national convention had declared that a State cannot put itself from under the national authority. It said, by its first nomination, that the present President, take him altogether, was the man to steer the ship of state for the next four years. [Loud applause.]

"Next it said—if I may be permitted to speak of myself, not in the way of vanity, but to illustrate a principle—'We will go into one of the rebellious States and choose a candidate for the Vice Presidency.' Thus the Union party declared its belief that the rebellious States are still in the Union, and that their loyal citizens are still citizens of the United States."

If Tennessee in 1864, with thousands of armed rebels within her borders defying the Federal Government and denying its authority, was a good enough State to take a loyal Vice President from, I would ask whether the same Tennessee after the war has ceased, her courts of justice open, and the Constitution and laws fully recognized, is not fortiori a better State and quite good enough to be represented by a Paterson, a Cooper, a Maynard, and other tried and true Union men?

Mr. Speaker, is this Congress, in its exclusion of gentlemen elected in pursuance of law, and who are eligible under the Constitution, and under our own enactments, acting in a spirit of justice and in accordance with law; or is not the ruling majority of this House in its course revolutionary? Taxation without representation was a primary cause of the Revolution by the colonies against Great Britain. And here I beg to quote an extract from the speech of Senator DOOLITTLE on this subject, which states the case briefly but to the point:

"Is it of no practical importance whether eleven States, with their ten million people, shall be taxed and governed without representation?

"With less than one third of that number of people, our forefathers, because the Parliament of Great Britain, in which they had no representation, passed laws to tax them, declared the independence of those States. Is it of no practical importance whether these eleven States and ten million people shall govern themselves under a republican form of State government, subject only to the Constitution of the United States, or whether they shall be held as subject vassals, to be governed for an indefinite period by the unlimited will of Congress, or by the sword? Is it of no practical importance whether the flag of our country, for which half a million have laid down their lives, and which bears thirty-six stars as an emblem of a Union of thirty-six States, speaks a nation's truth or is a monstrous falsehood?

"This is a question which neither men nor parties can avoid or put aside. It demands and will have an answer. It is a question, too, upon which there is and there can be no compromise and no neutrality. They are States in the Union under the Constitution, or they are not. We must affirm the one or the other. We must stand upon one side supporting the Lincoln and Johnson policy, maintaining the Union of these States under the Constitution to be unbroken, or we must take our stand with the Senator from Massachusetts upon the other, and maintain that the Union is broken, that secession is a success and not a failure, so far at least to withdraw eleven States from the Union or reduce eleven States to the territorial condition."

It will be remembered that the Baltimore convention, which nominated Lincoln and Johnson in 1864, repudiated the idea of the right of secession or that any State was out of the Union. The best evidence of this is the fact that Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, (a State then in rebellion,) was nominated for Vice President. If the doctrine promulgated here by the leaders of this House and of the Senate, that the States lately in rebellion are only conquered territory and cannot be regarded as States, and that the people are a foreign nation, then the President of the United States is ineligible to the high office he holds and must be regarded as a usurper!

To sustain the extreme and radical propositions advanced here, copious extracts and quotations have been made from those great lights of the judicial firmament, Grotius, Puffendorf, and Vattel, in reference to the jus gentium, the rights of belligerents, civil war, &c. Now, while I regard these high authorities with the most profound respect, I take the liberty to say that the opinions of these eminent writers on the law of nations and the law of nature are not in all cases applicable to this age and to the peculiar question presented here on the condition of the southern States in their relation to the other States of the Union. Grotius wrote in Holland two centuries ago; Puffendorf was counselor of state for the Kings of Prussia and Sweden; Vattel wrote in France. Their writings on international law were well adapted to the time, to the interpretation of the kings of the continent of Europe, and are doubtless now in many cases safe precedents. Our case, the late rebellion, is sui generis, which cannot be classed under any ordinary description of war, civil or foreign. The law of nations, as construed by these old and eminent authors in monarchical Governments in a past age, ought not and cannot be fairly applied at this day in our dealing with a portion of our own people, inhabiting a part and parcel of our own territory. A war with a foreign Power, or with a sovereign nation, would place the legal question involved in a very different light. We quelled the rebellion among our own citizens and in our own country. We conquered nothing. We have not more territory, people, or property than we had before. This, in my judgment, is the rational and natural deduction from the premises, in law and in fact.

But, Mr. Speaker, we have now been in session nearly three months, and have done little else than legislate for the benefit of the negro. Constitutional amendments by the score for the benefit of the negro; universal suffrage for the benefit of the negro; Freedmen's Bureau for the benefit of the negro; and so on, ad nauseam. Important and most necessary legislation in view of our critical financial and commercial condition is delayed for the party purpose of engineering measures like the Freedmen's Bureau, which, in other words, means a gigantic negro almshouse, with extraordinary powers and unlimited ramifications, and a horde of local salaried agents, whose duty it shall be to take care of refugees and freedmen; that is, to feed and clothe runaway, lazy, and vagabond negroes at the expense and cost of the industrious and hard-working white people. I have been under the impression that the war was over, the rebellion quelled, and that peace reigns throughout the land. If this be so—and there can be no doubt about it—I would inquire what we, this Congress, or any branch of our Government, have to do with refugees, either black or white? Is the whole country to be turned into one vast almshouse? What is the operation of this measure? The Secretary of War is empowered to issue provisions, clothing, fuel, and other supplies, including medical stores and transportation to the emancipated negroes, and practically establish a poor-house on the largest scale for the benefit of a people who desire no greater inducement to idleness and indolence than just such an institution. The negro will not be slow to take advantage of this extravagant public charity. No good can possibly result from this bad law. The negro becomes demoralized, and is encouraged in habits of laziness. You give shelter and maintenance to the black, which you have never done, and probably never will, to the most meritorious and deserving white man, North or South. The country is saddled with an army of officials, and with an additional blessing of some twenty million dollars a year expenses to sustain this extensive negro hospital, with its swarm of stewards, from little brigadiers to very small lieutenants.

The people want no such an establishment; it is unnecessary and useless. The States, North and South, under their local laws provide for the poor, aged, and decrepit. Let the able-bodied work! We have no power to pass such a law, and if we had, under any of the articles of the Constitution, why not begin with the indigent white people, or at least let them share in its benefits? There are thousands of white men disabled in the late war, unfit for work, and subsisting in many cases upon private charity. Why not extend to them a little of the munificence about to be bestowed upon a horde of negro drones? We have many brave men bearing honorable wounds—a number in my own home, Pottsville, the town that sent the very first company of patriot volunteers to this city to defend the capital in April, 1861; many widows and orphans of white soldiers; and why ignore them and only legislate for an inferior and lazy race?

It might not be out of place in this connection to bestow a passing thought on the poor, but honest and industrious emigrant who lands on our shores a stranger in a strange land. We might extend a little Government charity and aid and comfort to this truly valuable element of our population. No! Before this Congress the white man, however deserving, has no status. No "bureau" is established for the poor white soldier, or the poor German, Irishman, or other emigrant; he may get along as best he can. He is a white man! To justify this parental care of the pet lambs of our modern reformers we are informed by speeches here, and by reports of paid agents, humanitarian ex-generals and other women, some in petticoats and otherwise, who are now adventuring in the South on all sorts of spec and speculation, that the poor freedmen are most horribly treated; that their former masters are oppressing them, and committing all sorts of outrages on the "intelligent, docile, and gentle colored brethren and sisters." That this sort of stuff is manufactured for the purpose of inflaming the northern mind, and to affect legislation here for the benefit of the Republican party, or whatever you choose to call this mongrel combination, requires no elaboration at my hands; it is well understood. The condition of affairs in the South, the accommodation of the people to the change of circumstances, is well known and fully attested by the reports of President Johnson and General Grant.

But in order to show to this House, and to the people of the country, the shady side of the radical negro-loving picture, I copy an article from the Charleston Courier of February 2, giving an account of the treatment received by white men, Pennsylvanians, at the hands of the amiable colored "citizens" of South Carolina. I can say that the gentlemen alluded to are from my own county, Schuylkill, my own neighbors and friends men of character and means, who went to the South provided with letters here from General Howard and others, for the purpose of purchasing lands and engaging in agricultural pursuits. The Clerk will please read the statement.

The Clerk read, as follows:

[From the Charleston Courier, February 2.]

A "Freedmen's" Demonstration on Northern Emigrants—Extraordinary Affair on John's Island—Rough Experience of a Party of Pennsylvanians who wanted to buy Plantation Lands—Narrow Escape with their Lives—What the Negroes are Threatening to do.

Last Friday, a party of four gentlemen, on a visit here from Pennsylvania for the purpose of buying lands, &c., accompanied by two or three citizens, obtained the consent of General Sickles to visit all the islands adjacent to the city. The party were fortunate, also, in being tendered by General Sickles the use of the United States steam transport Mary Frances, and on Saturday morning they left the city and proceeded to the lower end of John's Island, at the junction of the Stono with the Kiawah river.

The party went ashore, but were unable to reach the plantation which they desired to examine and ascertain whether it would answer the purpose of their business. They returned to the steamer, previously agreeing to make another trial next morning. The party hailed a number of negroes in a small boat going to the next plantation, and were told not to land at night, or they would certainly be shot.

On Sunday morning they again landed and proceeded toward the settlement, inquiring the way of the negroes. They were shown how to reach the main land, but on approaching the houses observed considerable excitement among the people. They continued on their way, however, and on crossing from the marsh to the main land, on entering an old field, a body of negro men, armed with various kinds of weapons, approached them. When within twenty yards, the leader of the negroes cried "Halt!" The party stood still, the leader came up and demanded their business.

The nature of the visit was explained to them, and the desire expressed that the party be allowed to proceed unmolested. During the conversation, a gang of negroes surrounded them and became very threatening and abusive, and the party thinking they were not likely to succeed in their object, determined to return. This, however, the negroes promptly refused to allow, and threats of instant murder were made on all sides. Only two or three were willing to permit them to return to their boat.

After a violent altercation of words and several attempts at violence to the visitors, the negroes decided to escort their new prisoners to the quarters of the commissary, a sergeant of the thirty-fifth United States colored troops, about twelve miles distant. The party earnestly entreated the negroes to permit them to return to their boat, but their entreaties were unavailing, although the party agreed to steer directly to the commissary's post. They also suggested to the negroes to accompany them on the boat, but this was also refused.

They were then compelled to walk through the heavy sand the entire length of the island. The crowd of negroes continued to increase, all armed with muskets, rifles, shot-guns, revolvers, bayonets on sticks, scythes, hatchets, axes, clubs, &c., while the women had hoes, pitchforks, and clubs. Permission was given to send word to the captain of the Mary Frances to steam round to the place to which they were forced to walk.

On their route they were accompanied by a yelling, cursing, threatening crowd of negroes, freedmen, women, and children. As they advanced, they were continually met by other negroes running to the scene, all armed and breathing out the most severe and summary punishment for daring to land upon their island, where no white man had any right or should even dare to come.

After proceeding about a mile and a half they were halted, the crowd still increasing and becoming more violent. Here they were met by two freedmen, named Sam Flood and George Roberts, who quieted the crowd to some extent. Roberts being able to read, the party showed him their authority from General Sickles, General Devens, General Howard, at Washington, and General R. K. Scott, at Charleston. The crowd refused to recognize the papers, and said if the persons who wrote them were there they would serve them the same way.

Threats were also made against the captain of the steamboat, and regrets that they had not attacked the vessel the previous night and murdered the captain, crew, and all the party, and burned the vessel. Flood and Roberts endeavored to persuade the crowd to allow them to return, satisfied the party was right; but the crowd were determined to march them to the commissary's.

One of the party being crippled, efforts were made to procure a horse or mule, but this was also refused by the negroes. Finding entreaty of no effect, and that the crowd only continued to increase in number and fierceness, they proceeded on their way.

For four hours, from ten a. m. to two p. m., they were marched over the island. In front were about five to six horsemen, following them some eight to ten footmen, the prisoners bringing up the rear, with an armed guard on either side, followed by a mob of about one hundred and fifty, violently abusing and threatening.

At each plantation new accessions were made to the crowd, the women and children lining the road and joining in as the party passed. At one place a man stood with a pole, not less than twelve feet long, which he raised, intending to strike, but was prevented by the guard. At another place, a man named Armstrong came riding up, cocked his gun, and would have killed one of the party had not his horse been seized by the bridle by one and his gun taken from him by another.

About two o'clock they reached Townsend's place, where a freedman named Sam Johnson resides, who had been appointed by some officer of the Freedmen's Bureau as a general supervisor over the negroes on the island. This man being some distance from the house, the party were halted and compelled to wait for him, although within about two miles of the commissary's.

Here they were exhibited on the steps of the mansion, with a heavy guard of men in front of them, and a crowd of women behind; the former ready at any moment to fire upon them, and the latter abusing the prisoners not only with horrible language, but by poking them with sticks, &c. There was one United States colored soldier at the place, whom they desired to carry information of their condition to the sergeant, and offered to pay him for so doing, but he would not consent, handing the written note after he had talked with some of the captors, who evidently dissuaded him from complying with the request. Several times while waiting here, Flood, who still befriended the prisoners, was taken to one side by the gang, and efforts were made to let them take the party into the woods, doubtless to murder them, but he stood firm in his refusal.

After sitting in the sun for two hours, not even allowed to enter the house, and all the time exposed to imminent danger and insult, one man having cocked his gun to shoot one of the party, Sam Johnson arrived. He acted with great promptness, and at once started with them to the commissary's, taking only a few men with him. When within about a mile of the commissary's they met the sergeant coming to the rescue.

The sergeant informed the men who had arrested the prisoners that they were acting entirely without authority, and that any person, white or black, was privileged to come upon the island whenever they chose and be unmolested. He relieved them at once from arrest.

The scene during the day beggars description, and resembled a scene in a heathen country, cannibals dancing around and floating over their intended victims before giving them the fatal blow, which was likely to descend at any moment. Reasoning with them was thrown away. They said they knew no law but their own, that the island was theirs and no white man should ever come upon it. They care for no general or no authority.

Mr. STROUSE. I know the facts here given to be true; good evidence of fitness for civil and political equality. The negro is not only free, but it seems he claims the richest lands in the South in fee, in consideration, I suppose, of his freedom. Surely with the freedmen's almshouse and the Sea Islands the colored brother and sister ought to be able to get along without any white intruders from the North, to say nothing of a few white persons in the South who labored under the delusion that they owned these lands.

What was this war waged for on our part? Was it a condition, when Pennsylvania sent three hundred and fifty thousand men in the field, that the slaves should be set free or that slavery should be abolished? Was that the object, or was it for that that a million white men gave up their lives and the country plunged in debt in thousands of millions? No such condition was made then; on the contrary, we were told, and it was proclaimed and enacted by Congress, that this war was not waged in any spirit of oppression or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of these States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired.

The war has ceased; we have accomplished all that could be expected or was demanded, and as much more as it was thought the most rabid abolitionist could desire. Slavery was abolished, not as a right, but as an incident of the war. The institution of slavery was destroyed, and many good men of all parties rejoiced thereat, because it was believed that the vexatious question between North and South was solved forever.

Not so. The end is not yet. Rampant radicalism and bigoted Puritanism are not yet satisfied. Fanaticism will not permit the Union of the patriarchs to exist; the strife must be continued; the President must be ignored; the Magna Charta of our liberties destroyed before Jacobinism can rest.

To prove to the country, to my constituents, and to the people of Pennsylvania that I deal not in generalities, I will cite from our own files a resolution offered by my esteemed friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] at the beginning of the session of this Congress, embodying the whole case, I may say, on the state of the Union. The resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, That there is no warrant or authority in the Constitution of the United States for any State or States to secede, and that all resolves or ordinances to that end or for that purpose are absolutely null and void; and that the war, having defeated the attempt to thus divide and break up the Union, it is of vital importance to the Republic and to all the States thereof that the States recently in revolt, and each and every one of them, should resume their appropriate and constitutional positions and functions in the Union without delay; and to this end, laying aside all party feeling and all personal or other animosity, waiving all minor differences, and seeking earnestly to maintain and preserve the Union of our fathers, we will cordially sustain and support the President in every and all constitutional efforts and policy of restoration, believing that thereby the political, commercial, financial, and general prosperity of the whole country will be most substantially and permanently subserved."

This resolution, so conservative, so just, so statesmanlike, so truly American, was treated with contempt by this House. Instead of passing it unanimously, as became true Representatives and men who lay claim to some statesmanship, it found its way into the great whirlpool or maelstrom of the reconstruction, or better, destruction, committee of fifteen. No balm will come from that Gilead. The remedy is with the people. No relief can be expected from this Congress. The President—may God spare him for many years—must be sustained in his wise and truly patriotic course. His policy is the policy of the country; his plan of reconstruction and restoration of the States to their proper positions and places in the Union is the only one that the free and honest citizens of the country will adopt. If we wish again to have a perfect Union, if we desire again to be a great, happy, and united people, we must hurl from power the men who betray their trusts, and who do not reflect the sentiments of those who elected them. The Union will be restored if the people will do their duty. The great Democracy of the nation must come to the rescue. Stand by the President, and all will yet be well. But if this fanatical malaria shall again sweep over the North and West, if the President in his sublime work of patriotism shall be thwarted, if the people in their strength and majesty will not come to the rescue of the country in its hour of peril, and will give heed to the ravings of demagogues and disregard the teachings of history and the warning of statesmen, then may indeed the patriot in sorrow and anguish hopelessly exclaim, "God save the Republic!"

Mr. DEFREES. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend taking any part in this discussion, and only do so now to comply with what seems to be a general feeling of the members of this House, to have as full an expression of sentiment upon the various perplexing questions that are before it as possibly can be had. And, sir, I do not expect to throw any very great light upon these subjects, but to define somewhat my position in regard to some of the most prominent of them.

And probably the most difficult problem to solve of any other, is the policy to be pursued in what is generally termed reconstruction of the States lately in rebellion. To me our duty seems to be plain. I do not think it matters much for practical purposes whether these States are in or out of the Union. We may speculate and theorize and talk about abstract questions the whole session and be no nearer the true condition of those States than when the session commenced. Why not accept of the facts as they are? These States attempted secession. Had they succeeded they would now be out of the Union—there can be no question of that fact—and we would have no trouble in defining their true position. But they failed in accomplishing their designs, consequently they are in the Union, and you cannot get them out now that the rebellion has failed, only in the same manner in which you admit States originally into the Union, and that with their consent. Now, that is my opinion, and let it go for what it is worth.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the facts of the case. After four years of an unsuccessful attempt at revolution we find the organized power of the insurgent States destroyed, their so-called confederacy collapsed, and its executive head safely confined in an American fort, to await that justice that is due to treason. The great armies organized under the authority of the rebel government are disbanded, and the people left without any government, either civil or military, for their protection. Under these circumstances it was evidently right that the President of these United States, as Commander-in-Chief of the forces of the Union, which were the conquering power that produced the result, should organize some kind of government that would restore tranquillity to the disturbed state of affairs then existing, and give protection as much as possible to all the inhabitants. This is a power that I suppose no one will deny properly belongs to the military character of the executive department, and it matters not, in my judgment, whether he carries out that object by using a general of the Army, a military governor, or confers the power on such of the people as he may choose to select their own Governor and Legislature to assist in its accomplishment. The whole matter is under his control and supervision, and he employs these agencies to carry out his will until the civil power of the Government steps in and releases him from his military dictatorship. But it is argued by some gentlemen on this floor that the President has gone beyond the power conferred upon him by the Constitution; that he has no right given him by that instrument to organize governments in the disloyal States in the manner in which he has seen proper to do so.

Grant, for the sake of the argument, that in the confused condition of the country the President may have assumed some authority that is not clearly and distinctly defined, does it follow that we are to discard and throw away that that has been accomplished that is good? If these somewhat unauthorized governments in some of these States have made their organic law republican in form, and protected the personal and legal rights of all its citizens, why not adopt them as a foundation upon which to build up a more perfect superstructure? If Congress takes the matter of reconstruction in hand of these States, the same ceremony of proceedings will have to be gone through with that has already been done. The people will be called upon to select delegates to a convention, and a constitution will have to be made, all of which will take time and probably result in an organic law no better than the one now adopted. In revolutionary times it is quite possible that an Executive may exceed the strict letter of the law, whether from necessity or not; is it to be argued from that fact that all the benefits that may have inured to the Government are to be ignored; that all which is gained is to be surrendered back again to the foe? I think no man will take that position. Then, sir, I say whatever of good has been accomplished by the President in his reconstruction policy let us adopt it.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the President has exceeded the power conferred upon him by the Constitution. Neither do I think his course is one without precedent. The late Chief Magistrate, the man whom the nation loved, marked out the course, and the present Executive is but following in the "footsteps of his illustrious predecessor." Let us see what Mr. Lincoln said upon this subject when referring to the State organization of Louisiana, in that last memorable address made a few days after the surrender of Lee, and but a short time before his assassination. It will be remembered that some twelve thousand citizens of Louisiana had taken the oath of allegiance, and had organized a government in pursuance to a plan that he himself had recommended. He says:

"Now, if we reject and spurn them, we do our utmost to disorganize and disperse them. We in effect say to the white men, 'You are worthless, or worse; we will neither help you nor be helped by you.' To the blacks we say, 'This cup of liberty which these, your old masters, hold to your lips, we will dash from you, and leave you to the chances of gathering the spilled and scattered contents in some vague and undefined when, where, and how.' If this course, discouraging and paralyzing both white and black, has any tendency to bring Louisiana into proper practical relations with the Union, I have, so far, been unable to perceive it. If, on the contrary, we recognize and sustain the new government of Louisiana, the converse of all this is made true.

"We encourage the hearts and nerve the arms of the twelve thousand to adhere to their work and argue for it, and proselyte for it, and fight for it, and feed it, and grow it, and ripen it to a complete success. The colored man, too, seeing all united for him, is inspired with vigilance and energy and daring to the same end. Grant that he desires the elective franchise, will he not attain it sooner by saving the already advanced steps toward it than by running backward over them? Concede that the new government of Louisiana is only to what it should be as the egg is to the fowl, will she sooner have the fowl by hatching the egg than by smashing it. [Laughter.] Again, if we reject Louisiana, we also reject one vote in favor of the proposed amendment to the national Constitution.

I repeat the question, 'Can Louisiana be brought into proper practical relation with the Union sooner by sustaining or discarding her new State government?' What has been said of Louisiana will apply generally to other States."

No truer sentiment, Mr. Speaker, was ever uttered than is contained in this extract. Is it to be supposed that by holding these people off at arm's length after they have adopted constitutions that are republican in form, in which slavery is not protected, and the rights of all the people to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" are secured, that by so doing it will have a tendency to make them more loyal? Will it not, sir, have the opposite effect? Or is human nature so constituted that it needs to be goaded and stamped upon in order to induce love and affection for the power that wields the rod? In my opinion, no more successful way could be devised to drive out and extirpate all loyal feeling for the General Government that may now exist in those States than the course suggested to be pursued in reference to restoring them to their proper places in the Union by some gentlemen upon this floor. No healing balm is to be held out to increase the attachment of these people to the old flag of their country; but they are to be told that so long as there is a portion of their people disloyal, or a rebel left unhung within their limits, they are to receive no aid, no encouragement, from the conquering power.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am no more in favor of compromising with traitors than the most radical man upon this floor, for I believe if there is one sin more heinous than another that man can commit, either toward God or his country, it is the sin of treason. But I am in favor of rallying around and sustaining whatever loyalty may be found in those disorganized States. I am in favor of holding up the hands of the weak, and saying to those who are earnestly engaged in endeavoring to bring order out of confusion, to persevere; and although your State organizations are not all that we could desire or wish, yet we will come to your relief and aid you in your great task.

A great many reasons might be urged why a reconstruction of these States should take place at as early a day as practicable, and why no trifling outside issue that does not legitimately belong to the subject be permitted to interfere with a speedy consideration of their return. It might be argued that the financial condition of the country, and the large debt that has been incurred by the Government in successfully prosecuting the rebellion to a close, imperatively demanded that some recognized government should speedily be put into operation so as to realize from that section of the country the full amount of revenue that can be obtained from its productions. It is confidently expected that a very large income by the way of revenue can be had from cotton alone, and that, too, legitimately, without imposing an enormous tax upon the article. I notice that some writer, who has evidently given some attention to this subject, says:

"The cotton crop of 1859 reached 5,198,077 bales of ginned cotton, of 400 pounds each. The crop of 1865, is estimated at 2,100,000 bales. It is fair to estimate the crop of 1866, at 2,750,000 bales, as labor has become better organized, and the extreme high prices will greatly stimulate production. The average exports are about three fourths of the crop. Allow that 2,000,000 bales of the crop of 1866 will be exported; ten cents per pound on this amount will give to the Government, $80,000,000. The production for 1867 will reach 3,500,000 bales, of which, at the ratio of export above named, 2,625,000 bales will be exported, yielding to the Treasury $105,000,000. The product of 1868 will probably amount to 4,500,000 bales, the export of which will be about 3,375,000 bales, and the tax would yield $135,000,000; making a total revenue from the crops of the three years 1866, 1867, and 1868, of $320,000,000."

This calculation is based upon the supposition that the Constitution will be so amended as to permit exports from the States to be taxed. But without any change in the fundamental law, I see no reason why a tax cannot as readily be placed upon cotton as it can be upon whisky and tobacco, or any other article of produce, as is now done.

There is another consideration that should be taken into the account that ought to have great weight in urging an early settlement of the difficulties that exist between the late rebellious

States and the General Government. It is this: the whole course of internal trade is partially checked, the avenues through which commerce between the States formerly flowed are unprotected, and there is a lack of confidence existing between the two sections of the country. Restore the State governments at an early day and it will naturally bring together the citizens of the different sections, and the enmity and ill feeling that now exists will in a great measure die out; trade, which is the life's blood of the nation, will pursue its wonted course and the people will soon feel again as one people of a great nation, whose interests are identical (slavery having been removed) and whose future destiny depends upon the Union of the States.

But, Mr. Speaker, I know that some gentlemen upon this floor, and men, too, in whose opinions I have confidence, talk as though before anything should be done toward reconstruction that the people, or at least a large majority of them, should do some kind of penance, should humble themselves and acknowledge in some public way their manifold transgressions. I will admit that they have been, and are, great sinners, and it requires a great deal of magnanimity to look upon them with any degree of allowance, yet human nature is the same now that it has been for ages. You may induce love by kind treatment, but never by force.

Now, sir, I do not wish to be understood that I am ready, without any further legislation, to fully recognize these States, and indiscriminately admit their Representatives to this floor. I only take the position that whatever is done, and well done, should be recognized as far as it goes, and serve as a means to assist in a speedy reorganization and as an encouragement to those loyal men who are making every effort in their power to regenerate their States and blot from them the stain of treason, and present them, as purified by fire, to their proper places in the galaxy of States that make up this Union.

In order to justice, and settling conclusively forever the basis of representation, it would be right to require those States lately in rebellion to adopt the amendment to the Constitution recently passed this House, excluding persons prohibited from the exercise of the elective franchise from forming a part of the basis of representation. This provision is a fair one, and it seems to me that no proper objection can be raised against it. The States are left at perfect liberty to say who shall be voters and who shall not, and the greatest stickler for the exploded doctrine of State rights ought not to take exceptions to it.

This amendment being adopted, and the necessary laws passed by Congress to secure to "the citizens of each State all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States," and to guaranty alike in the several States all the rights of person and property upon an equality, and securing access to the United States courts to vindicate those rights, where the States fail to make laws for the protection of all alike, and their courts of justice shut against any class of its citizens, I can see no good reason in keeping them any longer out of representation here. It cannot be possible that any member of this Congress can long expect to keep these people in their present relation to the Government. We have got to live with them, and all that we should ask is a sure guarantee for the future. The "iron-clad oath," that members are required to take before they get seats in this House, is a bulwark against traitors, and no disloyal man can pollute these Halls with his impious feet as long as that remains on the statute-book, and I think no man or political party dare suggest its repeal for years to come. Should any of these States send men here who cannot comply with the requirements of that oath, send them back again, and continue sending them back until you reach the loyal element, and find men who never bowed the knee to the false god of secession. Let every district in each State stand on its own merits. If but one man who has kept his hands clear of the blood of the martyrs of the country can be found, let him come in and represent the constituency that sends him here. By pursuing a course of this kind it will not be many years before all this bitterness, hatred, and revenge that is now manifested in portions of this Republic will be forever gone, and this great nation will once more be united in a stronger bond of Union than ever before.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a few words in regard to the State of Tennessee. I think that State sustains to this Government a different relation from those of the other southern States. She kept a part of her delegation in Congress for two years or more after the rebellion was organized; and before that relation was broken off Andrew Johnson was appointed by Mr. Lincoln as provisional governor for the State. And even before the rebellion ceased an election for delegates to a convention of the loyal people was had for the purpose of framing a State constitution. That convention assembled and framed a constitution in which involuntary servitude is forever forbidden, and it has been submitted to the loyal inhabitants and by them ratified. A State government has been organized under that constitution, and the people have elected officers to fill the necessary positions in order to carry it into full operation. All this was done while yet the din of battle was heard within her borders, and her gallant sons were defending the old flag and their newly organized State government. I presume no one will say that that constitution is not republican in form; that it does not fill the requirements of the law.

Now, sir, I am in favor of admitting all the Representatives from that State to seats upon this floor who can take the required oath. It is said by some, as an objection to admitting these men, that the vote in the several districts was light, indicating but little loyalty there. That may be so, but I hold that whatever loyalty is there should be heard, that the heaven of loyalty that has been hid in her mountains, if encouraged, will in a short time leaven the whole people. Again, I do not think that the argument based upon a small vote would be considered a good one if applied to any of us who hold seats here. Suppose that there are sixteen thousand voters in my district, and but one half of that number should turn out to the election, would any man here pretend to say that in consequence of so small a vote that I would not be entitled to my seat? I think none would take that position. Let us admit Tennessee, and prove to the people of the southern States that we are not governed by any factious spirit, that the whole purpose of the Government is to restore each and all of these States to their proper position in the Union so soon as the rights of all the inhabitants are protected and a sufficient degree of loyalty is manifested by their people. This step taken, it will not be long before all the "erring sisters" will again be united in the bonds of peace and unity with the loyal States, and then we can once more adopt the language of New England's great statesman, "The Union, now and forever, one and inseparable."

And then, on motion of Mr. COOK, the House (at eight o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 16, 1866.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM ADAMS, D. D., of New York.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney General, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of January 17, information relative to the case of the United States vs. The city of San Francisco; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the petition of Albert Greenleaf, who represents that from the 23d of December, 1854, until the 30th of March, 1855, he was the Navy agent at Washington, in the District of Columbia, and in that capacity was instructed by his superior officers to pay out certain moneys to seamen belonging to the United States service; that such service was not contemplated by the law under which he was appointed; that his predecessors in office have been allowed a percentage upon the amount that they paid out under similar circumstances; and he claims an allowance by Congress for services of that description rendered by him. I move its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I present the memorial of one hundred and seventy-five citizens of Alexandria, Virginia, in favor of the establishment of a territorial government for that State; and as the memorial is short, I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I read it. It expresses the opinions of the signers more clearly and distinctly than I should be able to do:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, residing in Virginia, respectfully represent that, as soon as the military power of the nation had conquered the country so long held by the confederated rebels, which included Virginia, the same traitors who had set a price upon the heads of many of us because we were Union men, who were implicated in the murder of our neighbors for the same reason, and had destroyed by starvation and other cruelties thousands of national soldiers, possessed themselves of the political control of affairs within that portion of the lately conquered territory known as Virginia, and their Legislature now assumes to make laws binding upon the people.

One of the acts proposed, or already passed by that Legislature, provides for taxing the people of Virginia to pension the widow of Stonewall Jackson. Others aim to disfranchise loyal men by requiring a residence in Virginia of five years, as a qualification for voting. Others are intended to degrade and humiliate the colored population, to deprive them of the benefits of their freedom, and to subject them to the power of the whites by means of unjust and intolerably oppressive vagrant laws, and others, passed to satisfy the positive requirements of the national Government, ostensibly allow colored persons the right to testify in cases to which such persons are parties, but give even justices of the peace the power to decide, arbitrarily and peremptorily, upon the credibility of such testimony, and to exclude it from the jury, without appeal from such decision.

The only comment on the above measures that is needed is contained in the fact that the body which is about to enact them into laws received with great applause, only a few days since, a suggestion from its presiding officer that Robert E. Lee should be made Governor of Virginia. Meanwhile the majority of the people who were lately in open rebellion are not behind their Legislature in respect to disloyal conduct. Their feelings toward the Government of the United States are well illustrated by their demeanor toward their loyal neighbors, and have in an organized and official capacity, through the medium of their so-called courts of justice, already gone so far that the Lieutenant General of our Army has been obliged to interfere and prohibit the execution of the decrees of these courts during such time as the military power of the Government may extend to us its protection.

They have, with entire unanimity, excluded Union men from all participation in the management of the so-called State government, and are even threatening to call a State convention for the purpose of removing its executive head, who has at length arrived at a point where he seems disposed to act more firmly in dealing with these dangerous men. They assume that they have done no wrong, but acted nobly and honorably in rebelling against the Government of the United States, and, still wearing their confederate uniform, they demand, as a right, admission at Washington to a full participation with loyal men in the control of the General Government.

Finally, were anything more needed to exhibit the state of feeling on the part of the people of Virginia, we refer to the report of Major General Carl Schurz to President Johnson, as being a correct and truthful description of it in every particular. Nor has the Government of the United States been an idle spectator of all these things since the surrender of the military forces of the rebellion. A part of its Army, which for five years past has been employed in subduing rebellion in the field, is now employed in subduing rebellion in the so-called "Legislature of Virginia," and its presence among us is called for only by the notorious disloyalty of these people, who are so anxious to be admitted to the rights and privileges of State government.

The moment the military power is withdrawn from among us, and the loyal men of Virginia are left to the protection of the so-called "State government," their only safety will be in immediate flight.

Such being the facts, we respectfully represent that the experiment of State government in Virginia has proven an utter failure, and our only hope lies in a territorial government, under the immediate control of the national Administration."

We therefore pray your honorable bodies to set aside the government of which Francis H. Pickens is the head, and to establish in its place a territorial organization.

I present also eleven other petitions of citizens of Accotink, Fairfax county; Woodlawn, Occoquan, Prince William county, and other portions of Virginia, of like import with the one which I have just read. I move their reference to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Ralph Crooker, and others, citizens of Boston, Massachusetts, praying for an increase of the duties on foreign imports so as to encourage American industry; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POMEROY presented the petition of José Serafin Ramires y Casanoba, a citizen of the Territory of New Mexico, praying for the passage of an act confirming to him the grant of land known as the Cañon del Agua, in the county of Santa Fé; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. RIDDLE. I present two memorials from citizens of Jefferson county, Virginia, praying Congress to withhold its assent to the proposed annexation of Jefferson county to West Virginia, or, should Congress deem it advisable, in order to obtain beyond all doubt the real desire of the people of that county on the subject, to refer the matter of the transfer to a vote of the people of said county, taken, as would be their right in such case, under the laws of the State of Virginia. As the chairman of the Committee on Territories has just informed me that the House bill on this subject has been reported to the Senate, and as twelve hundred of the thirteen hundred voters of Jefferson county have already petitioned against this proposed transfer, I wish to add fifty more petitioners to the list, and let these lie on the table along with the other petitions on the same subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying for a reduction of the tax on the sale of agricultural implements; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS presented the memorial of Charlotte F. Buckner, praying that duplicate bonds may be issued to her in lieu of bonds stolen from the banking house of Winn & Simpson, at Winchester, Kentucky, by rebel soldiers on the 1st of May, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

MR. BANCROFT'S ORATION.

Mr. FOOT. In pursuance of the concurrent resolutions of the two Houses of Congress adopted on the 12th instant, the chairmen of the joint committee of arrangements on the memorial exercises of the late President of the United States, Abraham Lincoln, have placed a certified copy of said concurrent resolutions in the hands of Hon. George Bancroft, and have requested of him a copy of his address on the occasion referred to for publication, as will appear from the following correspondence; which I move be read, laid upon the table, and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letters will be read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read, as follows:

THE CAPITOL,

Having shared the high gratification of hearing the address, we take pleasure, in accordance with the second of the concurrent resolutions, in requesting you to furnish a copy of the address for publication.

We have the honor to be, with very great respect, your obedient servants,

To Hon. GEORGE BANCROFT.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 14, 1866.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your letter of yesterday and a copy of the two concurrent resolutions of Congress to which you refer. The thanks of the Senate and House of Representatives, for the performance of the duty assigned me, I value as a very distinguished honor, and I shall cheerfully furnish a copy of the address for publication.

I remain, gentlemen, very sincerely yours,

GEORGE BANCROFT.

Hon. SOLOMON FOOT,

Chairman on the part of the Senate.

Hon. E. B. WASHBURN,

Chairman on the part of the House.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the report of the Court of Claims in favor of the claim of Sarah Weed, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Jerome B. Pillow, praying for compensation for cotton alleged to have been taken and appropriated by the officer in command of the United States forces at Helena, Arkansas, on or about the 12th of July, 1862, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 90) enlarging the powers of the levy court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. KIRKWOOD, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 87) making a grant of lands in alternate sections to aid in the construction and extension of the Iron Mountain railroad from Pilot Knob, in the State of Missouri, to Helena, in Arkansas, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 184) to authorize the sale of marine hospitals and revenue cutters, reported it without amendment.

THOMAS F. WILSON.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas F. Wilson, United States consul at Bahia, Brazil, praying for compensation for losses sustained by him in consequence of his being compelled to abandon the consulate by the action of the Brazilian Government, have directed me to report a bill for his relief, and I will ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill at this time. It will lead to no discussion, and I can explain it in one moment.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 146) for the relief of Thomas F. Wilson, late United States consul at Bahia, Brazil, was read twice by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay him $1,500 in full compensation for the loss of his personal effects in consequence of being compelled to abandon his consulate and residence at the time of the capture of the pirate Florida at Bahia.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will give an explanation if any Senator desires it. This Mr. Wilson was consul at Bahia at the time the pirate Florida was cut out by the Wachusett. He was on board the Wachusett when the capture took place, and in consequence of the Wachusett being fired upon by the Brazilian fleet, he was carried out to sea, and that night a mob assembled and destroyed his residence, his library, his personal effects, and his clothing, all of which amounted to some fifteen or seventeen hundred dollars. He has never been able to return to recover anything. The Committee on Commerce deem it a fair and just and equitable claim on the Government, and have recommended the passage of the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. It occurs to me that this bill had better have a little further consideration. If we attempt to pay for the destruction of property of citizens of this country done by mobs, we may find ourselves compelled to pay a great deal of money from the public Treasury. This may be simply the entering wedge by which we shall part with a large slice of the public money.

Mr. CHANDLER. I submit to the Senator from Iowa that this is the only case of the kind that ever has occurred, or that probably ever will occur. This is the only pirate Florida that was ever cut out of a foreign port and taken off the high seas while she was destroying our shipping by millions of dollars. This consul proved himself to be brave, energetic, active, prompt, the man for the place. He did his whole duty, in my judgment. I was not going to say a word in explanation of it, because the bill almost explains itself, and I hoped it would pass unanimously. I hope now that it will.

Mr. GRIMES. Is there any report accompanying this bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. I have made the report. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no written report, the Chair understands.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems to me, when we are going to establish a precedent as important as this may be, that we should have at least a written report, so that the specific facts may be put upon the record that we may know when we are to depart from it in the future and when we ought in strictness to adhere to it. I do not like to vote in favor of the passage of such a bill as this. I do not know what the particular facts are. I understand the general facts as stated by the Senator from Michigan. Those general facts might compel us to pay for the destruction done by mobs in Washington or Baltimore or New York or elsewhere.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senate should be very careful indeed before they establish a precedent like this. It is said by the Senator from Michigan that this is probably the only case of the kind that will ever occur, but I think that I could state to him a great many analogous cases. Let me state to him one now. A woman in the vicinity of Norfolk had a place called Ocean View, three or four years ago, at the time Norfolk was taken. She gave to the Union commander very important information which led to the capture of Norfolk. The next day or two the rebels burned her house down and destroyed the house and everything there was in it, and she was turned out of doors with six little children. She makes her application now to Congress to pay for that property which the rebels destroyed. That was but an armed mob. Can we do it? The committee would be very glad to see the ground on which they can go, but they have not been able to discover it. They are considering anxiously whether they can or not. It seems to me that is an analogous case. I think we had better not set such a precedent as this hastily. There may be merit in it, but before we pass this bill and make a precedent, let us be sure that we get upon a ground upon which we can stand and which will cover all these cases. I do not know that I shall be opposed to this bill in the end, but we certainly do want a little more time for consideration in regard to it. I hope it will not pass at the present time, and I suggest to the Senator that he had better let it lie over.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not desire to press it if Senators wish to examine it. I think it is a perfectly clear case. I will let it lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 147) to modify the act entitled "An act to prevent the spread of foreign diseases among the cattle of the United States;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DIXON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 148) to prevent the perversion of the mails to fraudulent and illegal purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DIXON. This bill involves some legal questions which will ultimately require the revision and examination of the Committee on the Judiciary, but I now move that it be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and that the bill, with certain papers which I present with it, be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 31) manifesting the sense of Congress toward the officers and seamen of the vessels, and others, engaged in the rescue of the officers and soldiers of the Army, the passengers, and the officers and crew of the steamship San Francisco from perishing with the wreck of that vessel; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

MARY C. HAMILTON.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. There are two or three pension bills which can be passed without the slightest opposition in five minutes, and they may as well be disposed of. I move to take up Senate bill No. 56, for the relief of Mary C. Hamilton.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 56) granting a pension to Mary C. Hamilton, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mrs. Mary C. Hamilton on the pension rolls, at the same rate of pension allowed her under the act passed for her benefit, and approved June 3, 1858, payment to commence from and after the expiration of the term created by that act, and to continue for and during the term of her natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SARAH FITZGIBBON.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I now move that the Senate take up the bill No. 82.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 82) granting a pension to Sarah Fitzgibbon was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. Its purpose is to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Sarah Fitzgibbon, widow of Thomas C. Fitzgibbon, late major of the fourteenth Michigan volunteer infantry, upon the pension rolls, at twenty-five dollars per month from the 1st day of May, 1865, subject to the limitations and restrictions now imposed by existing pension laws.

PENSIONS TO ARTIFICERS.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I now move to take up Senate bill No. 116.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 116) to extend the benefit of the pension laws to artificers was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that all persons either mustered or detailed as artificers in any branch of the service of the United States shall be placed upon the pension rolls, under the same limitations and requirements as privates now are under the present pension laws—eight dollars per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have that explained.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The object is just this: the Commissioner of Pensions has determined by a decision that artificers in the service are not entitled to pensions. This bill only provides that those who are mustered in as soldiers or artificers and are afterward detailed and killed in the service shall be entitled to pensions. Under the law as it existed heretofore, an artillery regiment was entitled to, for instance, a blacksmith, who was called an artificer; and if he is killed in service, this bill embraces him. That is the whole of it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Was he a soldier?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. He must be an enlisted soldier before the bill can apply to him.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have the bill read again.

The Secretary again read it.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions whether there is any objection to amending the bill by inserting "wagoners" after "artificers."

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Yes, sir, there is great objection. Wagoners are not mustered into the service as soldiers at all; they are in under contract, and we thought we could not provide for wagoners. We had that question up. These are soldiers mustered or detailed as artificers; they fall within the spirit of the law but not within its letter, and we think they ought to be embraced, but we think great objection would apply to making wagoners pensioners. They were in under contract, and were not soldiers.

Mr. HOWE. I think they were enlisted under the act of 1861. The act provides for enlisting them, one to each company, I think, as wagoners. They are subject to the same discipline, the same obligations as other privates, and receive the same pay, I think, but I am not certain about the pay. The Commissioner has expressed to me precisely the same opinion about wagoners as is now stated to be his opinion as to artificers.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The committee had the whole subject under consideration, and thought it better not to embarrass this bill by any provision on that point. The committee thought this bill was clear as far as it went, and ought not to be embarrassed with other questions. Wagoners stand in a different relation from artificers. The quartermaster's department has been in the habit of hiring hundreds of wagoners who ran all these risks and were not soldiers. There may have been some soldiers who were detailed as wagoners, and probably they ought to be embraced, but I am clearly of opinion that any provision on that subject should not be attached to this bill. As far as the bill goes it raises no new question under the pension laws.

Mr. HOWE. But do I not understand that this bill provides for artificers enlisted and not detailed?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. Now, if "wagoners" be inserted in this bill after the word "artificers," it would not cover the case of wagoners who are employed by quartermasters on wages, but it would only apply to enlisted wagoners.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I do not know that there would be any objection to that, but I should prefer to have the committee look into the matter, because they once determined against including wagoners, and I should not like to decide the question in the Senate on the mere offering of an amendment here.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The principle has always been against allowing pensions for services not strictly military, and if we once depart from this principle there is no knowing where we should end. It may be that these persons come under some military division. If so, there would perhaps be no objection to including them within the pension laws; but the proposition ought to be very carefully examined. If we once begin to give pensions to any class not strictly military, there is no knowing where it will end.

Mr. HOWE. But the Senator will allow me to say that Congress has already made these services strictly military, because it has provided for enlisting one wagoner to each company.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But I should like to have the matter examined by a committee, that we may see exactly how the case stands.

Mr. HOWE. It is so much more convenient to include the case in this bill, that I wish the Senator from Indiana would take it into consideration.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. There were a few enlisted men detailed as wagoners from special regiments during the war, but to every one such there were twenty who were never detailed at all, but simply hired by the quartermaster's department. I think we ought to have a separate bill if we intend to include wagoners.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator does not understand me. I am only talking of those who were enlisted and mustered in as wagoners, instead of being mustered in as privates.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I should greatly prefer to have the committee look into the whole matter, and bring in a bill to cover the case, if it is to be provided for, because to insert the term of "wagoners" here may perhaps include forty thousand persons employed during the war.

Mr. HOWE. It will cover just one to each company.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. One in each company of infantry was enlisted under a certain law, but in addition to that the quartermasters have been in the habit of hiring as many wagoners as they chose, for transportation. Why make a distinction?

Mr. HOWE. I am trying to make the Senator understand that if the word wagoners is introduced here it will only cover the cases of those who are enlisted and mustered. It would not cover the case of wagoners employed by the quartermaster's department. The law provided for enlisting one wagoner to each company. They have been enlisted and have been mustered; but the Commissioner of Pensions holds that inasmuch as wagoners are not named specifically in the pension laws, therefore he cannot grant them pensions. But they are subject to the same discipline, subject to the same exposures, to the same accidents, and to the same sufferings, and incur the same disabilities as private soldiers, and they have the same claim on the gratitude and support of the Government. However, I cannot hope to force this amendment on the bill against the opposition of the chairman of the committee. I wish he would consent to allow the bill to lie over that this question may be considered. I am satisfied that if he did consider it, he would consent to put in here the provision that I have suggested.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. In order to make this matter a little more certain, I move to amend the bill by inserting in the third line, before the word "detailed," the words "having been mustered shall have been;" so as to read:

All persons either mustered or having been mustered shall have been detailed as artificers, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to take up the bill in reference to the Court of Claims, which was under discussion the other day.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill (S. No. 33) in relation to the Court of Claims was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; it was read the third time, and passed.

JAMES BAWDIN.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, the bill (S. No. 142) for the relief of James Bawdin was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

On payment to the United States of $1 25 per acre therefor, it is provided that the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall cause a patent to be issued to James Bawdin for that tract of land lying and being at Eagle Harbor, on Lake Superior, situate upon the north part of section number six, in township number fifty-eight north, of range number thirty west, in the Sault Ste. Marie land district, State of Michigan, containing about six and fifty-four hundredths acres of land, being all that part of the lands known as the light-house reservation at Eagle Harbor, which lies east of the dotted line marked "S. 86° 45' E. 12.76 chains," as shown on the plat of "Bawdin's survey" of the reservation in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, except so much of the lands as may be required for the use of a road four rods wide, from the light-house across the six and fifty-four hundredths acres to the waters of the harbor, as the same is now laid out and used for that purpose. The act, however, is only to be construed to be a relinquishment of the title of the United States, and is not to interfere with the rights of third persons.

Mr. HARRIS. Since this bill was reported I have ascertained that the petitioner has died. I move therefore to amend the bill by inserting before the name of the party the words "the heirs of."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended to read, "A bill for the relief of the heirs of James Bawdin."

INTERNATIONAL OCEAN TELEGRAPH.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 26) granting to the International Ocean Telegraph Company the right and privilege to establish telegraphic communication between the city of New York and the West India islands.

The bill, which had been referred to the Committee on Commerce, was reported by that committee with an amendment, to strike out all of the original bill and to insert the following in lieu of it:

Whereas James A. Strymser, Alfred Pell, jr., Alexander Hamilton, jr., Oliver K. King, Maturin L. Delafield, William F. Smith, and James M. Digges, their associates, successors, and assigns, persons composing the International Ocean Telegraph Company, an incorporated company chartered by the State of New York, are desirous of establishing a line of submarine telegraphic communication between the United States of America and the West India islands and the Bahamas: Now, therefore, in order to facilitate the said enterprise,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the said International Ocean Telegraph Company, incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, their successors and assigns, shall have the sole privilege for a period of twenty-five years, to lay, construct, land, maintain, and operate telegraphic or magnetic lines or cables in and over the waters, reefs, islands, shores, and lands, over which the United States have jurisdiction, from the said United States to the islands of Cuba and the Bahamas, either or both, and other West India islands.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said International Ocean Telegraph Company, their successors and assigns, be authorized and empowered to import, free of duty, all material, manufactured or unmanufactured, necessary only for the construction, laying, and erection of said submarine cable or cables: Provided always, That the said International Ocean Telegraph Company shall, at all times during a state of war, give the United States the free use of said cable or cables, to a telegraphic operator of its own selection, to transmit any messages to and from its military, naval, and diplomatic agents: And provided further, That the said International Ocean Telegraph Company shall, within the period of five years from the passage of this act, cause the said submarine telegraphic cable or cables to be laid down, and that the said cable or cables shall be in successful operation for the transmission of messages within the said period of five years; otherwise, this grant to be null and void.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That Congress shall have power, at any time, to alter or repeal the foregoing act.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that this is too important a bill to be passed at this time when the morning hour is just expiring. I move that it be postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) It is the duty of the Chair to announce that the morning hour has expired, and to call up the special order for one o'clock.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest that the vote be taken on this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want to read the bill; it proposes to remit duties and to give an exclusive right to certain individuals.

Mr. CHANDLER. Do I understand the Senator as desiring further time for examination?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well; let the bill go over.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The special order is the joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States, upon which the Senator from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, it has been the boast of the people of the United States that they are in the enjoyment of constitutional liberty, not liberty depending upon the will and pleasure of any man, but a liberty that is secured by the fact that the powers of the Government are defined and limited, and that the rights and privileges of the people are well secured. Our Constitution was made by men eminently qualified for the work. No one now questions that. The American people have been very fortunate in that regard. As patriotic, as pure, as intelligent, and able statesmen as ever united in the performance of any labor for their country were the men who made the Constitution of the United States. The time was auspicious. The war of the Revolution had just closed, and the people of the different States or colonies had become firmly united and cemented by the circumstances of that war. There was no sectionalism in 1789, but the men of South Carolina loved the men of Massachusetts as they loved the men of Virginia. Seven years of war had passed over the country and the men of every section had mingled in that war. The soldier of Virginia had been associated with the soldier from Massachusetts; they had dwelt under the same tent together; they had shared the hardships of the field, the dangers upon the rough edge of the battle; their comrades had fallen together and slept in a common grave.

The glories of that war were common to all. They did not belong to Virginia alone or to Massachusetts alone, but all had shared in common perils for a common purpose and had achieved a common glory and a common good. Under these circumstances our fathers met to frame a Government for the people; and for three quarters of a century we thought they had framed the best Government it was possible for the intelligence of man to devise, a Government adjusting the interests of the different sections so as that there could be no discord, leaving to the States the management and control of all domestic matters, and giving to the Federal Government the control of those general questions that affected all the people. Under that Government for three quarters of a century we lived and prospered, we prospered as no people had prospered, we grew in wealth and in population beyond all parallel.

A war came in 1861 upon the country again, the most unfortunate that can befall any people; and now, after a war not against a common enemy, but at the close of a war between different sections of this country, in which the men of the North have been arrayed in battle against the men of the South, when we have learned to hate one another as no people have ever hated, we now propose to amend the Constitution. I appeal to Senators to inquire of their own judgments and hearts and say to the country, are you now in the right spirit to change the fundamental law of the land? Eleven States are absent from our councils; they are not here to be heard. We say they shall not come in, and we, the men of the North, propose to make a Government for the whole country. We, without the hearing, without the counsel of the men of the South, propose to make a Government which they shall respect and obey. Are the circumstances favorable to this work? How different from the circumstances that surrounded our fathers when they made the Government! Peace then, peace now; but peace then after a war which had united the people; peace now after a war which has made such divisions among us as that you now say eleven States ought not to be represented in Congress.

Again, sir, the fact that there is such a desire to change the Constitution should admonish us that we ought not to attempt the work. I understand that there are seventy propositions to amend the Constitution. In this Hall there have been two or three upon the same subject-matter, two or three amendments that we shall not pay a debt of the South which the South itself has repudiated, which can never according to the terms of the debt itself become due. And covering nearly the entire instrument propositions for amendment are made.

I was once, when quite a young man, a member of the Legislature of my State, and nothing struck me as a greater curiosity than the fact that upon certain questions there was a great desire to offer propositions and bills, and especially the stray laws, the road laws, and the school laws. Members from different parts of the State seemed to make a race of speed which should succeed in first getting his proposition before the body. Such a spectacle we to-day witness in regard to the Constitution of our country. It seems to be a race among Senators and Representatives who shall offer the greatest number of amendments to the Constitution of the country. I do not expect to vote for the proposition that is now before us or any other that may be made. In some regards I think the Constitution could be improved, but I would not propose any amendment nor would I vote for any when I think we are not in a condition for the work.

This proposition comes from the committee of fifteen; a committee which was constituted and the powers of which were defined by this resolution:

"Resolved, That a joint committee of fifteen members shall be appointed, nine of whom shall be members of the House and six members of the Senate, who shall inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States of America, and report whether they or any of them are entitled to be represented in either House of Congress; with leave to report at any time by bill or otherwise."

Sir, there was one question upon which it was important that the action of the two Houses should be uniform, should agree, and that was in respect to representation. It seemed to be important that when Senators were admitted into this body from southern States, Representatives at the same time should be admitted into the House of Representatives. In other words, the Senate should not allow representation from a southern State and the House deny that representation to the same State; and therefore it was understood that there should be a joint committee on that subject, because it was a question relating to the organization of both bodies, and this committee was organized with a view to reach that question, and that only—to inquire into the condition of the southern States, whether they are entitled to representation; and upon that question to report to the Senate and to the House either by bill or otherwise. Sir, the Senate has never said to that committee that it might inquire into any other question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Allow me to ask the Senator if he heard the explanation which I gave?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did, and I am going to speak of that. This is an extraordinary committee to consider just one question, and that is the question whether the southern States ought to be represented in this Hall and in the Hall at the other end of the Capitol. That committee has not been authorized by the Senate and House of Representatives to inquire into any other subject, as I said. Upon that subject they may report by bill or otherwise. How is it that, passing from that subject, the committee has reported two amendments to the Constitution upon subjects not referred to them?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is very much mistaken. Allow me to explain; I do not wish to interrupt the Senator except to explain. The committee did not take that view of its powers. To be sure, by the original resolution under which the joint committee was appointed, the limitation was precisely as the Senator expresses it; but it was a joint committee, and the House of Representatives referred the resolutions originally offered by one of my colleagues [Mr. BLAINE] to that committee. Now, sir, it is a well-established principle in business here, that however a committee may be raised it can report upon any subject that is referred to it, for that is a new commission, so to speak; and that subject being specifically referred to the committee they understood that it was their duty to report upon it; and it being a joint committee, and each House making its reference, the committee supposed, and I as an individual supposed, that it was proper or at least competent for the committee to report to either branch; and it was thought best to make the report at the same time to both branches. That is a question as to the right or duty of the committee under the reference, which might be decided if there was any occasion to decide it. I make this explanation to show what view the committee of fifteen took of it. As to the other report which was made of a joint resolution, allow me to say that it was made specifically the duty of the committee to inquire into and report upon that subject by a resolution which was offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN,] and which was adopted by the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I understood the facts precisely as the Senator has stated them; and if this were a committee of the Senate, or exclusively a committee of the House, his view of the subject would be right perhaps; but I suggest to him that if a committee of this body are to consider of the business of this body alone, has a defined jurisdiction, and the body inadvertently refers to that committee some subject that does not come within that jurisdiction, it is the custom of the committee without consideration of the subject to report it back to this body that it may go to the appropriate committee. But, Mr. President, this is not a committee of the Senate; it is not a committee of the House; it is a committee to represent both bodies upon a subject common to both, not a subject over which there should be the separate action of the two bodies, and therefore the House cannot add to the jurisdiction of a joint committee, nor can the Senate alone add to the jurisdiction. It being a committee representing both bodies, originated by a joint resolution and its jurisdiction defined, that jurisdiction can only be enlarged by a joint resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The practice of the Senate is the other way every day. Take the case of the Joint Committee on the Library. Matters are referred by each body to the Library Committee which are entirely outside of the Library itself, or anything connected with it; but being referred by each House to that committee, which is a joint committee, a report is made by bill or otherwise to each branch. I have been a member of that committee, and know this to be the every-day practice.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If that be the every-day practice of the Senate, to which proposition I do not agree.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is the fact at any rate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If that be the practice of the Senate, it ought now to be abandoned. Why, sir, does the Constitution establish a House of Representatives and a Senate, and declare that the legislative power shall not belong to one body, but shall belong to two bodies, acting separately and independently? The purpose of the Constitution is that every important measure affecting the country shall, before it becomes a law, receive the consideration of two Houses separately, each giving its separate attention to the subject. And so far does the principle on this subject go that we cannot in debate in this body refer to the doings of the House of Representatives; we are not allowed by the rules of the body to refer to the action of the House; and why? Because it is the purpose that the action and judgment of the House shall have no influence upon the Senate, nor shall the judgment of the Senate have any influence upon the House; and the purity of legislation requires that upon all grave questions each House shall act separately and independently, and that principle is not departed from except when there is a disagreement between the two bodies, and then a committee of conference attempts to reconcile that disagreement.

And, sir, if this is a sound principle of legislation, I ask, ought it to be departed from when we propose to amend the Constitution of the United States? Ought not a proposition to amend the Constitution to be considered by each branch without reference to the judgment of the other? Here, sir, is a large committee, nine of the House, six of the Senate, fifteen, holding a joint conference upon a subject before it comes to either body, and at the same time a report is made from that committee to both bodies, thereby defeating the very purpose of the Constitution in having separate branches of the Legislature. This committee had its birth in a party caucus and has constituted itself a new French Directory, set up in Washington to control the action of Government, to grasp in its hands the functions of Congress, and to dictate to the Executive.

It is composed of nine members from the House of Representatives, and of six members from the Senate. It meets in secret session, wholly free from the observation of the public, and at such place and time as may suit its own pleasure. Over the door of its meeting place might be appropriately written, "No admittance for the American people; this place is sacred to a political inquisition, whose will is law to the President and to Congress, and whose fiat binds the fortunes and determines the fate of eleven States and eight million people." The committee select witnesses according to their own good will. Their writs of subpoena run throughout the country, and they can draw upon the Treasury for their expenditures. They cogitate constitutional amendments for the operation of the previous question in the House of Representatives, and for the lash of party discipline in the Senate. The representation of eleven States stands suspended during their pleasure, and while they may devise how the President of the United States shall be broken to their will, or be degraded before the people. In the exercise of this fearful and odious power, one fourth of the people of the nation are arraigned before the secret bar of the tribunal of fifteen, and their fate may be determined upon the evidence of spies, informers, contractors, political agents, and hostile officials.

That, Mr. President, is the committee which proposes these amendments to the Constitution of the United States; a committee organized for party purposes; a committee that had its birth, as I said, in a party caucus; a committee that was carried through the House of Representatives the first day of the session, and, in my judgment, could not have been carried at any later day of the session; a committee that was carried through this body after some amendments of the House resolution. That committee proposes amendments to the organic law of the country, and we are expected, and I suppose it will be done, to pass them in this body.

Then, after speaking of the committee that brings the proposition before the body, I wish to inquire a little into the history of this constitutional amendment that is proposed. The first proposition that was talked of during the session, and the very first proposition that came before this body, was the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] offered on the first day of the session. That proposition was, as he has since very ably discussed the question, that taxation and representation shall rest upon the same basis. His proposition was that taxation and representation should rest upon the voting population of the United States, limited to those persons who are voters and over twenty-one years of age. I heard no objection to that proposition until it was made in the House of Representatives. I presume I may refer, under the rules, to what may be said in the House as a matter of history without referring to it for any purpose of influencing the judgment of the Senate. The objection made in the House to the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts (for the same proposition was made there) was that it was unequal; and the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] who reported this resolution from the committee, expressed the same objection to the voting basis that was made in the House; that it was unequal; that the male population of New England was not so great in proportion to the female population as in the western States, and especially as in California, and therefore New England, under that proposition, would not receive so large a representation as the western States. There was force in the objection; for if you examine the census of 1860, it will be found that the female population of the six States of New England exceeds the male population by some fifty thousand, while in the six great agricultural States of Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, Illinois, Missouri, and Iowa, the male population exceeds the female population by two hundred and ninety-seven thousand seven hundred and fifty-eight. Adopting the voting population, then, as the basis of representation and taxation, the six great agricultural States of the West that I have mentioned would have the advantage of New England by two or three Representatives. New England would not endure that. From the time the speech was made developing that fact in the House of Representatives, no man has raised his voice for the voting basis.

Mr. President, upon what should representation and taxation rest? The Constitution as it now stands provides:

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States, which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons."

This is the provision of the Constitution which it is proposed to amend. This provision rests upon the doctrine of the Revolution, upon the established principle and policy of the Government that representation and taxation shall have the same basis of support. The propriety and justice of the principle was not questioned in the Convention that made the Constitution, nor in the conventions of the States that ratified that instrument, and it is to-day the cherished doctrine of the American people that taxation ought not to go beyond representation. The opinion has been attributed to the President that taxation ought to rest upon property. In my judgment, it should be so, but at the same time I may say it will never be. Property is the proper subject of taxation, and taxes ought to be levied upon persons in proportion to their estates. That is the principle that prevails in the States, and in my judgment property should be the basis of Federal taxation; but it is not, and while New England, in proportion to her population, and New York and Pennsylvania are so much more wealthy than the other States of the Union, that basis never can be secured.

Then, sir, if taxation cannot be made to rest upon property, where I think it should rest, ought taxation to go beyond representation? I will not attempt to discuss the question so fully exhausted by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] One difficulty in forming the Constitution of the United States grew out of the relation of the slaves to the people. In some respects they were regarded as persons, and in other respects as property, and a compromise was the result of the consideration of the question—a compromise to the effect that three fifths of the slave population should be counted. But, sir, under the Constitution, as the slaves became free, they fell into the population that were counted man for man; and now as slavery has been abolished, the entire colored population is to be counted for the purpose of taxation and representation under the present Constitution; but it is proposed to change the Constitution so that they shall not be counted in States where they are not allowed to be voters.

This proposition when first brought before the body provided that representation and direct taxation should stand together and rest upon the same basis. After a further consideration of the subject, it was decided to strike out the words "and direct taxation," and that was the second report from the committee. The effect of that is, that taxation upon the southern States shall be increased, so far as it rests upon the colored population, two fifths, and representation, so far as it rests upon that population, shall be reduced three fifths. "Now, there is in the northern States a non-voting white population. You count them for purposes of taxation. You count them for purposes of representation. You do not for either purpose inquire whether they exercise the privileges of a citizen by voting. You simply count them, and you make no difference. But in the South you propose to tax the people of the States upon the colored population, and you deny them representation upon that population."

Mr. President, upon what principle does this proposition rest? Every great amendment to the Constitution of course ought to rest upon some principle. Neither its provision for taxation or for representation rests upon property, as I have said. It does not rest upon voters, because it allows persons to be counted who are not voters. White persons who are not voters are counted. It does not rest upon the entire population of the country, because it excludes nearly four millions who are not voters. In the North, I understand there are from fifteen to twenty Representatives upon a non-voting population, and this proposed amendment will not change it in that regard. I will read a very short extract from two speeches on this subject made by very distinguished supporters of this proposition:

"Again, many of the large States now hold their representation in part by reason of their aliens."

Another gentleman, the chairman of this committee in the House, said:

"Now, sir, there is another fatal objection to the proposition of my friend from Ohio."

That proposition was that representation and taxation should rest upon the voting population.

"If I have been rightly informed as to the number, there are from fifteen to twenty Representatives in the northern States founded upon those who are not citizens of the United States. In New York I think there are three or four Representatives founded upon the foreign population, three certainly. And so it is in Wisconsin, Iowa, and other northern States. There are fifteen or twenty northern Representatives that would be lost by that amendment."

Then, sir, there are to-day in the House of Representatives from fifteen to twenty Representatives based upon a population who are denied the right of voting by the laws of the country. If it be right to deny to southern States a representation in the House of Representatives because they do not allow a certain class to vote at the polls, as honest men wanting to deal justly and fairly, how can you deny a representation upon a non-voting population in the southern States? We are considering too grave a question to perpetrate inequality and injustice. If the North has upon a non-voting population the benefit of from fifteen to twenty Representatives, how is it that she can say that no other section of the country shall enjoy the same right, if it is the pleasure of the States to deny the right of voting?

Then, sir, as the proposition does not rest upon population, as it does not rest upon property, as it does not rest upon voters, upon what principle does it rest? Upon what principle do Senators propose to adopt this amendment to the Constitution? I can understand it if you say that the States shall be represented in the House of Representatives upon their population; I can understand it if you say that they shall be represented upon their voters; but when you say that one State shall have the benefit of its non-voting population and another State shall not, I cannot understand the principle of equity and justice which governs you in that measure. Sir, if it does not stand upon a principle, upon what does it rest? It rests upon a political policy. A committee that had its birth in a party caucus brings it before this body, and does not conceal the fact that it is for party purposes. This measure, if you ever allow the southern States to be represented in the House of Representatives, will bring them back shorn of fifteen or twenty Representatives; it will bring them back so shorn in their representation that the Republican party can control this country forever; and if you can cut off from fifteen to thirty votes for President of the United States in the States that will not vote for a Republican candidate, it may be that you can elect a Republican candidate in 1868. Now, sir, upon this subject I ask the attention of Senators. These are no words of mine. I will put upon the stand the most influential Republican to-day in the Congress of the United States. He says:

"According to my judgment they ought never to be recognized as capable of acting in the Union, or of being counted as valid States, until the Constitution shall have been so amended as to make it what its framers intended; and so as to secure perpetual ascendancy to the party of the Union."

That is the phrase of these times by which men undertake to describe their own party, "the party of the Union." A party that to-day says this Union shall not be restored, a party that to-day says that eleven States shall stay out of Congress, arrogates to itself the name of "the Union party." Describing his party by that term, he says that the Constitution must be so amended as to secure the perpetual ascendancy of the Union party:

"If they should grant the right of suffrage to persons of color, I think there would always be Union white men enough in the South, aided by the blacks, to divide the representation, and thus continue the Republican ascendancy."

That is a little more distinct. Dropping the phrase, "the Union party," the head of this committee, the chieftain in the House, comes squarely out in the House of Representatives and says that the Constitution must be so amended as to secure the perpetual ascendancy of the Republican party. Mr. President, have we come to that in the Senate of the United States, that we abandon principle, that we seek no longer to base representation upon population, that we do not seek to base representation upon voters, but that we mingle the basis of representation so as to secure a party life? I hope that I shall never come to the consideration of a question of so grave importance with a partisan feeling.

There is another purpose, in my judgment, or if it be not a purpose it will be an effect of this measure, to cut off representation from the agricultural portion of the country, and to that extent to increase the representation of the manufacturing districts, and thus permanently fasten upon the country the New England policy and the New England power. My colleague has agreed to this, my colleague, who represents a portion of the agricultural section of the country, has agreed in a very able speech to the proposition that from the agricultural States shall be stricken a large proportion of their representation. Why, sir, is the right of voting given for the benefit of the party who casts the vote alone, or is it given for the benefit of the voter and the country? Is representation based upon population for the benefit of a single individual, or for the protection of the interests in which all the people have their fortunes? The States and country that rest upon the Ohio and Mississippi rivers and their tributaries have a common interest. They cannot cease to be agricultural States. The plow must turn wealth up to the men of the West. We need a representation in the House, and I say to my colleague that I cannot agree with his judgment that we have a right to consent that a portion of the representation which secures agriculture shall be cut off from the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, I would not say a word against New England. I honor and respect New England for her glorious revolutionary history, for her virtues of frugality, industry, and enterprise; but I cannot consent that she shall have an increased advantage in the representation of the country. I will ask my colleague if he does not to-day know that advantage has been taken of the West during this war. I will not say by design; I will not say for the purpose of taking advantage; but I ask him if in fact the interests of the West and the Northwest have not been subordinated to the interests of another section of the country?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Does my colleague want an answer now?

Mr. HENDRICKS. After I am through. When was it known that such a tariff prevailed as governs the country at this time? When was it known that there was such an adjustment of the tariff, such an exclusion of foreign competition as that the manufacturer could charge the western consumer for his cotton products the same price that he asked when cotton stood at three hundred per cent. more than it does now? And yet, sir, such is the condition of the country. Whatever the western man to-day buys he pays from thirty to one hundred per cent. more for than if the trade of the world lay open to him; and this has been accomplished during the period when agriculture was but partially represented in the House of Representatives. My colleague is afraid of southern votes in Congress. I am not upon that question: Men will vote in accordance with their interests, when not controlled by a constitutional duty or by a sense of right. During the five years that have passed the southern agricultural States have not been represented in the House of Representatives, and a most unjust and unequal adjustment of the revenue system has been adopted, much to the prejudice of the State that my colleague and I represent in this body.

Now, sir, shall we so permanently arrange the representation of the country that agriculture cannot hold up its head? Shall we so permanently adjust representation as that the spindle and the loom shall always be more productive and honorable than the plow and the harrow? Sir, I do not consent to it; and without any reference to sectional feelings or sentiments, I ask for the West simply equality in the legislation of Congress. Demanding that much we ought to be heard; but we have not been heard during the past five years, as the taxpayers of the West very well know. While New England has been making her returns to those who have invested their capital in manufactures of from twenty to one hundred per cent., the western farmer, when he buys the necessities of life at the present charges and settles his accounts with the tax collector, can scarcely provide the comforts of life for his family and for the education of his children. Is it not known to every Senator that when manufacturing establishments can make dividends of from twenty to seventy per cent. there is wrong done to some interest in the country, and that is because agriculture has not been fully represented in Congress during the past five years?

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANTHONY. I make it a rule never to interrupt a Senator, and I would not now interrupt the Senator if I did not know he was the most good-natured member of the whole body. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not propose to go into the argument at this time, but I wish to say that there never has been a time since I have been familiar with public affairs when the protection on manufactured articles was so small, when the duty upon the foreign article compared with the excise duty upon the domestic article was so small as it is to-day. On many manufactures the excise duty is larger than the import duties.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator's proposition upon its face may be so; I have not examined during this session the details of the revenue laws; but the importer pays his tax in gold and the manufacturer pays his in paper. Taking the schedule, I have no doubt the proposition of the Senator is true as to some articles, but taking the whole of the manufacturing interest of the country, I think it is not true.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say further, and it is the last time I shall presume on the indulgence of the Senator, that the manufacturer pays the excise duty in paper, but he pays it at the time when he manufactures the article. The importer pays the duty in gold, but he puts his goods into warehouse and pays the duty at the time that is most convenient to him and most embarrassing to the domestic producer.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think there is any point in the remark of the Senator. I think the manufacturer pays his tax when he puts his goods upon the market. Is that not so?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not always.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does he pay his tax before he desires to sell his goods?

Mr. ANTHONY. He does in some cases, not before he desires to sell them, but before he can sell them.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very true. I say when he proposes to put his goods upon the market he pays his tax, and the importer when he proposes to put his goods upon the market pays his tax.

Mr. ANTHONY. The manufacturer pays his tax before he puts his goods on the market. He has to pay his tax as he manufactures the goods, every month.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Of course he has to pay his tax before he puts his goods in market, because he cannot sell until he pays his tax, nor can the importer sell his goods until he pays his duties. He cannot take them out of the bonded warehouse until he pays his duties.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Permit me to state that there are manufacturers in this country who have paid their tax a year prior to the time they sold their goods; that there are cases where there have been five or six taxes paid to the Government on domestic goods six or seven months prior to the time the manufacturers sold them. That is common, and known to the manufacturing and business interests all over the country.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not intend to discuss that particular feature of the revenue system of the United States any further. I believe the general statement to be true, that the revenue system adopted within the last five years is oppressive to the West, hard upon agriculture, and favorable to manufactures. I do not intend to go into an elaborate discussion of that question. If the revenue laws are again brought before the attention of the Senate, I propose to investigate them and to show just how and to what extent this is so. I have attributed it to the fact that agriculture is not represented in the House, and that this amendment proposes permanently to exclude a large interest to a considerable extent from representation in the House.

Now, Mr. President, if it is right to change the representation in the House of Representatives, that is, to disturb the foundations of the Government so as to readjust representation, and, as Senators claim, to make it equal and just, why is it not equally right to disturb the representation in the Senate? I know very well the reply will be that the Constitution itself forbids an amendment of that instrument in respect to representation in the Senate; but, sir, the power that made that provision can unmake it; the power to amend the Constitution can reach that very provision and change the representation in the Senate. I know it is said that representation in the Senate is one of the Federal features of the Government; but that argument has lost its force when we are taught in these latter times that State rights are not to be respected, and that all power is now in the Federal Government. Suppose we undertake to make representation in the Senate equal, how would it stand? The six New England States, with a population of 3,135,253, have twelve Senators in this body, while the six great agricultural States of the West—Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, and Missouri—have a population of 8,414,525, with a representation of twelve Senators. With nearly three times the population of New England, we have the same representation. If those States have this advantage in this body, is it fair to try to cut off the representation of agriculture in the other end of this Capitol? While Indiana has a population of 1,350,428, Rhode Island—a glorious, gallant little State—has a population of 174,620. So far as representation in the Senate is concerned, one man in Rhode Island has a voice and power in the legislation of this country equal to eight men in Indiana. Taking the entire New England States, one man in New England has the voice and power in legislation in the Senate of nearly three men in the West. Is that right, is that just, when you are talking about equality of representation? I do not want to change that feature in our Government. I wish to stand by the State representation as our fathers established it. I do not want to take any of the political power from New England that our fathers agreed she might have. I will stand by their representation as firmly as they will, but I do not like that they shall ask to reduce the representation of the West and Southwest.

This, then, Mr. President, as I have said, is a proposition, first, to perpetuate the rule and power of a political party; in the second place, it is a proposition the tendency of which is to place agriculture under the control and power of manufactures and commerce forever; and, in the third place, it is intended, I believe, as a punishment upon the southern States. Why will Senators say that the southern States may give to the colored people the right to vote and then they will be fully represented? Senators know very well that the southern white people cannot do that. They know very well that in two of the southern States, South Carolina and Mississippi, the colored population is larger than the white population, and they know that it is impossible for a white population to remain in either of those States if you place the colored man upon a platform of political equality with the white man. Sir, it is impossible. Instead of being controlled by white men, those two States would fall under the control of the colored people. Their Legislatures would be filled by colored people; Congress would be filled, so far as Representatives came from those States, by colored people; and colored men would be sent as Senators to this body if those States were forced to give political power to them. There is, then, no propriety in Senators saying that the southern States can confer the right to vote upon the colored people. It is impossible for them to do it. In the condition of their society it cannot be.

Then this proposition is simply to take from them a representation upon that portion of their population, and to adopt a rule in regard to them different from the rule that applies to the people of the North. We have from fifteen to twenty Representatives in the House of Representatives based upon a non-voting population. The same representation upon a non-voting black population you propose unjustly to deny to the South. Then, sir, is it a punishment? Now that the war is over, now that the southern people have laid down their arms, now that they have sought to come again fully and entirely into the Union, now that they have pledged their honors and their fortunes to be true to the Union and to the flag, now that they have done all that can be done by a conquered people, is it right, after a war has been fought out, for us to take from them their political equality in this Union for the purpose of punishment? The Senator from Maine, the chairman of the committee, says that the right to control the suffrage is with the States, but if the States do not choose to do right in respect to it, we propose to punish them. You do not punish New York for not letting the foreigner vote until he resides there a certain period. You do not punish Indiana because she will not allow a foreigner to vote until he has been in the country a year. These States are not to be punished because they regulate the elective franchise according to their sovereign pleasures; but if any other States see fit to deny the right of voting to a class that is peculiarly guarded and taken care of here, then they are to be punished.

Mr. President, in this idea of punishment I think I may venture to say that Senators do not reflect the gallant Army that has been recently disbanded. That Army fought in a high cause, as they thought, and when the enemy fell down before them as a great Army, they felt that they should protect them; and you cannot find a bold soldier in the North who would take advantage of his prisoner and punish him. But we, as a nation, because we have succeeded in the great controversy, because we have subjugated the southern States, because they are conquered, in the language of some gentlemen, because they have laid down their arms, now propose to punish them in a manner unknown to the law heretofore.

Mr. President, as a punishment this thing cannot be done without violating the principles of humanity, as I have said, and the great principles of the common law, and the principle of the Constitution of the United States. That instrument provides that no ex post facto law shall be passed. That means that no law shall be passed punishing an act which was innocent at the time it was done, or punishing it by penalties not prescribed at the time the act was done, or punishing it upon less testimony than was required to convict at the time the act was done.

Now, sir, you say that these people have been in rebellion, that they have committed a great crime, which I agree to. How are they to be punished? They have been punished in that manner known to nations as the highest punishment that can be inflicted. They have gone through the battle and they have been defeated. They come before us as a conquered people; and this is the punishment, if this is to be regarded as a war between belligerents. Do Senators claim that prisoners of war taken by one belligerent from the army of the other can be punished because they are prisoners of war? That is a sentiment of the barbarous ages which, thank God, has passed forever, so far as Europe and America are concerned. One reason why I would like to see Maximilian driven from American soil is that he violates a sentiment that every American respects, and puts prisoners of war to death.

Now, Mr. President, is it possible that Senators will say, that in this condition of the country they are going to change the Constitution of the United States for the purpose of punishment or to gratify revenge? Is there such a sentiment here? If there be one here, there is not among the soldiers at home. If a soldier were to see a wrong being done to his captive he would interfere at the risk of his life to prevent that wrong. Let that sentiment be respected here. Let equality, justice, and right prevail in our legislation, especially in regard to amendments of the Constitution which must stand.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] spoke yesterday of punishing States. I wish he were here, sir. That Senator dwells far off, his land resting upon the peaceful waters of the Pacific, and intervening mountains cast their shadow over his home and the homes of his people. I presume there is not a colored man in that country. If Indiana sees fit in her sovereign pleasure to deny to the ten or twenty or thirty thousand negroes in that State the right to vote, he, from Oregon, proposes to punish Indiana! What has he to do with the suffrage in Indiana? We do not let them vote, and unless you compel us to do it, we propose never to do it; and yet he says there is to be punishment for it. I do not like that word "punishment" between States of this Union. You have no right to punish a State because it does that according to its own pleasure which it has a right to do. If a State, as was admitted by the Senator from Maine, has a right to control the question of suffrage, no Congress has a right to control her in the exercise of her power. But I wish to speak of that in another connection.

Is this a measure to coerce? On that point I desire to read what the Senator from Maine said. First, it is to punish, and in the second place to coerce, to do indirectly that which you cannot do directly. Let us see what the Senator said:

"But, sir, the great excellence of it"—

That is, this amendment of the Constitution. I think he might have left off the adjective.

"But, sir, the great excellence of it—and I think it is an excellence—is, that it accomplishes indirectly what we may not have the power to accomplish directly."

I presume this is the first time in the Senate of the United States that a boast was made, and it was claimed as a virtue for a measure, that it accomplished indirectly what could not be done directly. What the body has not the power to do directly, we boast we can do indirectly! Let me read the rest of the Senator's sentence, and you will see what he means:

"If we cannot put into the Constitution, owing to existing prejudices and existing institutions, an entire exclusion of all class distinctions, the next question is, can we accomplish that work in any other way?"

Why can you not put it in the Constitution directly, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] proposes to do? As much as I dislike his measure, I like it for its boldness and its frankness; and all men, when they come to reflect a little about it, I think will admire it for those qualities. But the Senator says, "Because of existing prejudices we cannot amend the Constitution to give the right of suffrage to colored people, and therefore we will do this thing indirectly." Why can you not do it directly? Because of the prejudices of the people; or, in other words, because the people will not let you do it; but as the people are against it we will do it indirectly. Was ever such an argument as that heard in the Senate of the United States—an argument in favor of amending the Constitution of the United States—that it does a thing indirectly that we cannot do directly! Indirection, I thought, was always a vice. I have always observed when I went into court to defend a client that if there was anything in his conduct that brought about a result by indirection the jury was sure to beat my case. They would say, "If he has been in the right, if he has had a fair contract, why has he not met it directly, and why is there indirection and shifting and winding in the business?" So I say to the Senator, if he cannot go before the American people with his amendment, and say to them, "Here is a proposition, based upon humanity and right; here are four million people that ought to be allowed to vote, and you are expected to come up and indorse the right." But he says he cannot carry it in that way, and he proposes a coercion upon the southern States, that they shall be compelled to do it. My colleague proposes to vote for it; and why? His voice has never been heard in Indiana to enfranchise the ten thousand negroes there; and although his party was in power in the lower House of the Legislature by a very large majority they could not pass it at the session just adjourned in that State. But here by indirection you propose to give the right of suffrage where all admit the negroes are not as well qualified as they are in the northern States. Up to this time, five States of the Union have allowed the elective franchise to the negro, and thirty-one have denied it; one out of seven have allowed it; and now the Senator says he dare not go before the Legislatures for the ratification of the direct proposition; but he will wrap this thing up—I was going to use an expression which I decline to use—he will so cover up his proposition as that the people will not understand the full force of it; or, in other words, so that he can appeal to the selfishness of the northern people to do in respect to other States what they will not do in respect to themselves, and thus carry a measure that will secure political power forever. Senators, do you concur in a proposition like that? Can an Indian go before the Indiana Legislature and say, "Senators and Representatives, you must coerce the southern States to give the right of voting to the negro, but you must not give that right here at home?" That is what the Senator's proposition means. "We cannot trust these northern Legislatures, because they will not agree to the thing directly; but if we leave them out of it and make it applicable alone to the southern States, then we will get it through in some way."

Mr. President, I ask Senators the question: have the States, under the Constitution, the right to control the elective franchise? Does any Senator here question it? The Senator from Massachusetts does. He thinks that Congress may control the right of suffrage in the States, and upon the question of logic, I think he has the advantage of the majority of this body. Last week, or the week before, Senators voted for a bill which they themselves said was not constitutional except under the recent amendment. That amendment provided that slavery should be abolished and that Congress should have power to adopt appropriate legislation to carry it out; and you said that under that provision Congress had the power not only to declare the negro a freeman, but to go further, to go into the States and give him the right to testify in the State courts, and you did that upon the argument that it was necessary in order to protect him in his freedom. Was not that your argument? Then, when the Senator from Massachusetts says, "You may go still further; the right to testify in the courts is important to protect the colored man in his freedom, but the right to vote is more important," do you, Senators, deny that the right to vote is more important to protect the liberty of a man than the right to testify? Who denies that? Give the colored men of a State the right to vote, and if at all numerous they become a power in the State. They do not have to go to the Legislature and beg; they go there as the sovereigns, the makers of legislators, and say to those legislators, "You shall not come back here again unless you do us justice." Is not that the highest guarantee that can be given to a man for his liberty and his rights? I understand that to be the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts. If you said that in the exercise of your judgment to protect the freedom of the negro it was necessary to give him the right to testify in the courts, the Senator from Massachusetts has a right to demand your vote upon the other proposition, that the right to vote is important to protect him in his liberty and in his rights. I am not embarrassed by this question, for I did not vote for that bill. I do not believe in the construction that you put upon the constitutional amendment. I do not believe it authorizes such legislation, and therefore I am not embarrassed by it; but I think that when other Senators come to vote upon the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts they will find some embarrassment.

Before this digression I was asking the question, does any Senator deny that the States, especially in the absence of legislation by Congress, can control the right of suffrage? If that is a constitutional right in the States, have you a right by any influence to attempt to control the States in its exercise? Can you send force into Indiana and demand of her Legislature that they shall enfranchise the colored men? Certainly not. Can you go into the Legislature of Indiana and persuade them to do that thing? Can you go there as a Senator for that purpose? Certainly not. Then can you send a bribe into the Legislature of Indiana to influence the action of that body upon a subject over which it has exclusive control? You say to Indiana, "You adopt a particular policy and you shall have enlarged representation in the House of Representatives." You say to Kentucky, "If you will adopt a particular policy in regard to a question over which you have exclusive control, we will bribe you by giving you a larger representation in the House." Sir, it is worse than force; it is a bribe, a bribe of political power. The remark was made by a Senator—I think by the Senator from Maine—"You know the desire of men for power, and especially political power;" and that is the influence that is to be held out before independent States! Take Kentucky, which has a large colored population, a population so large that the enfranchisement of the colored people would materially affect the policy of the State, and the question is for that State to decide, shall they be voters? That is their question. We say so here. Kentucky is sovereign upon that question. We in Congress say to Kentucky, "You have that right, and we admit you have the exclusive right; it is so written in the Constitution; now, Kentucky, you have at present nine Representatives; if you enfranchise the colored people of your State you shall have ten; but if you do not you shall have but four or five or six." That is the influence which my distinguished friend from Maine says it is proper should be exercised. That is the indirection, that the Federal Government shall use its power to bribe a State by the offer of additional political influence in this Union if she will adopt a policy agreeable to us. I cannot believe that Senators will be influenced by that argument, although presented with so much ability; it is certainly impossible.

But, Mr. President, do we want to make all the colored people vote? I am very free to say that I do not. I do not want to make any of them voters. I am not going to discuss the question whether the colored man is the equal of the white man. I think there need be no discussion on a question like that. But without reference to that, without reference to the question of equality, I say that we are not of the same race; we are so different that we ought not to compose one political community. Had the white men of this country a right to establish a Government and thereby a political community? If so, they had a right to say who should be members of that political community. They had a right to exclude the colored man if they saw fit. Sir, I say, in the language of the lamented Douglas, and in the language of President Johnson, this is the white man's Government, made by the white man for the white man. I am not ashamed to stand behind such distinguished men in maintaining a sentiment like that. Nor was my judgment on the subject changed the day before yesterday by the lamentations of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] sounding through this body like the wailing of the winds in the dark forest, "that it is a horrible thing for a man to say that this is a white man's Government," and asking "Would you have said so down in front of Petersburg?" or, "Would you have said so at the funeral of the colored soldiers?" &c.

Mr. President, there is a great deal said about the part the colored soldiers have taken in putting down this rebellion, a great deal more than there is any occasion for, or there is any support for in fact or history. This rebellion was put down by the white soldiers of this country. [Applause in the galleries.]

THE PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) Order must be preserved in the galleries.

Mr. HENDRICKS. And it is not right to tear the laurels from white brows to put them on the brows of the colored people. They did not put down the rebellion. It was the white men that did it. I am asked if they did not both do it. I do not know that they both did it. I know that there was an attempt to take Port Hudson, and that there was no taking it when the colored soldiers were in the front. I think it possible, from my reading of that transaction, that they were placed in a hazardous position, where they should not have been placed when the mine was blown up at Petersburg; there was a good deal of boasting for a few days as to what had been accomplished by the colored soldiers, and a good deal of comparison between the colored soldiers and the white soldiers, much to the prejudice of the latter; but when we came to know all about it we found that the colored soldiers did not accomplish much. The suppression of this rebellion was a great undertaking, and it took all the intelligence, the physical power, and the courage of the white men of this country to accomplish it. It was accomplished, and it is distasteful to me to hear claimed for a race that did but very little in it the honors that belong to the white men who were in the Army.

Now, sir, I am not in favor of giving the colored man a vote, because I think we should remain a political community of white people. I do not think it is for the good of either race that we should attempt to make the Government a mixed Government of white and black. I do not think it is for the good of the black man. I do not believe that the black man can maintain himself in that strife between him and the white man which that policy will establish. When it does come to a strife, we know what the result will be. We know when there comes that strife of races between the white men of the United States, the mixture of the best blood of Europe on this continent, and the black men, what will be the fate of the black man. I do not want it to come. I want a just policy, a fair policy, a safe policy, just to us, just to them, safe to us, safe to them, to be adopted now that they are thrown in this new position and relation. But I am not in favor of placing over the white man such a government as the Freedmen's Bureau establishes for such an end. I am not in favor of attempting to mix these races. I want to see the white race kept a white race, and the power in this country without mixture and without an attempt at mixture.

My colleague used a strong expression on this subject. That I may do him no injustice I will read his words:

"If you wish to avoid a war of races, if you wish to produce harmony and peace among these people, you must enfranchise them all."

That is a speech that I think he has never made in Indiana, and I am a little curious to see the impression it will make when he first repeats it there. I know very well my colleague will never repeat it with any argument drawn from the military achievements of the colored men in its support. I think he will never make an argument that they are entitled to it because they have done so much toward achieving the results of the war. But in support of the proposition my colleague reads from Chancellor Kent. He says:

"Chancellor Kent is still more explicit on the present point, for he says distinctly: 'If a slave born in the United States be manumitted, or otherwise lawfully discharged from bondage, or if a black man be born within the United States, and born free, he becomes thenceforward a citizen.'—Kent's Commentaries, 4th edition, p. 257, note."

My colleague stops there. That is not the question that we are discussing whether he is a citizen or not. A man may be a citizen and not a voter. He may be a voter and not a citizen. But my colleague stops at a comma. He ought to have read to the period and then he would have read to the Senate the following:

"But under such disabilities as the laws of the States respectively may deem it expedient to prescribe to free persons of color."

That is the entire sentence, that if they are made free they are citizens, but under such disabilities as the States may choose to prescribe.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Will my colleague permit me a moment?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Is not the power of the State to prescribe conditions precisely the same in regard to all citizens, whether white or black?

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is not the question I am discussing. It has not been a question in dispute whether the State had control of the elective franchise. It is absolute and perfect, and the exercise of it in the State of Indiana is in regard to white people. We say that when a foreigner comes to Indiana, after he has been in this country twelve months and in the State a certain length of time, he shall vote, because the people see fit to say so; and they could, in the exercise of their power, have said three years instead of one. I do not dispute that the State has the control of the entire question. I believe I have answered my colleague.

My colleague, in support of his proposition that we must allow all men to vote, reads from Kent, that the colored people when manumitted become citizens; and I read the rest of the sentence, that they become citizens under such disabilities as the State may choose to prescribe. The difference between my colleague and myself is this: that I think the State has the right, she may at her pleasure discriminate when she comes to give the elective franchise, between the white men and the colored men, and I am in favor of the discrimination as she has made it.

Mr. YATES. I wish to address this question to the Senator from Indiana: whether, if I, as a citizen of Illinois, shall remove to Indiana and make my domicile there, there is any power in the Legislature of the State of Indiana to disfranchise me entirely? I admit that it can impose qualifications of residence; but is there power in the Legislature of the State of Indiana to disqualify me entirely, to exclude me from the franchise forever? That is the question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, if the distinguished Senator from Illinois should ever come to the State of Indiana, I have no doubt that he will be treated by the people of the State with all the courtesy that his high position in the country requires, and which he is entitled to. I do not think there would be any disposition in exercising the powers of the State to disfranchise any white man.

Mr. YATES. Could they do it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall not answer that question, for I understand very well the next question the Senator is going to propose, and as that is a judicial question, I am going to leave that until the Supreme Court of the United States shall decide it, and perhaps the question will come up from the State of Indiana. We exclude colored people from the State by our constitution and laws. If they come in in contravention of the constitution, we deny them the right to vote. By a law passed at the last session of the Legislature, passed by the House of Representatives as well as the Senate, the House being largely Republican, it is enacted that the negro may testify in the courts of the State provided he came into the State before that constitutional provision was enacted; but if he has come in since, he shall not testify. These questions bring up the very one that the Senator is after. I am not speaking of the white people of Indiana. I am speaking about the right of the State to control the elective franchise, especially in regard to the colored people, answering the point that my colleague made in his citation from Kent.

Now, Mr. President, are these eleven States of the South in the Union? If not, what need is there that we shall amend the Constitution? Why amend the Constitution in respect to eleven States when you do not allow them to be represented here? If you hold that these States are in the Union, and if you intend ever to let them be represented here, is it not fair to let them be represented before you change the organic law to their prejudice? Is it not right that the humblest man, the poorest man, the guiltiest man shall be heard in his defense?

The criminal that sheds human blood upon your streets, you will not condemn to death until he has had an opportunity to be heard. You cannot cover up human nature with so much of crime and guilt as that you will deny his voice when he asks to be heard. Then, sir, if eleven States wish to be heard, if eleven States stand at the door of your Capitol and ask admission, that they shall be heard before you amend the Constitution to their prejudice, will you deny them that hearing? You deny that to them which you concede as a natural right to the poorest, the meanest, the vilest, and the wickedest of our race. If they are not here, we had better not legislate for them. If we do not intend to let them come back. My colleague upon that subject, and it is a very grave subject, has used the following very eloquent language:

"If these rebel States constituted stars on your flag, they were as the lost Pleiades gone darkling through space, unobservant to any human eye. They could not be detected by the mightiest telescopic power that the judiciary of the country has ever been able to bring to bear upon them. They were not only out of the Union, but they were substantially and to all intents and purposes out of existence; and so the President must have regarded them in his proclamation."

That is a very beautiful figure, comparing these States to a system of planets going around the central power, the Federal Government. My colleague claims that these revolving stars have shot from their orbits, are lost, out of existence. Why, sir, to carry out his figure as drawn from astronomy a little further, what are the powers that keep the stars in their orbits? First, there is velocity that God has given them, which tends to throw them off in straight lines, and then there is the attraction to a common center tending to bring them to that common center, and the two powers operating equally they are held in their orbits. In the States there is a tendency, from an exaggerated view of State rights, to go off, but then there is the central power to hold them within the Union. Has the central power during the last five years been less than heretofore? The constitutional obligation is one of the central powers, the interest of each State to stand by the whole is another of the powers, but during these last five years we have resorted to the extraordinary power of war, and that war has brought them again within their orbits, and they are seen by the feeblest vision in their position.

As I said, Mr. President, it is not my province, nor perhaps would it be exactly in good taste for me to be the defender of the President in regard to his policy. I know nothing of his policy except as I have seen it in his acts, in his messages, and his proclamations. But in respect to these eleven States and his efforts to bring them into proper relations with the central Government, I do sustain him. I sustain him, not because I am of his party, but because I am of that common country which demands a restoration of this Union.

My colleague and other Senators have attacked the President, in very courteous language, I admit, in language becoming a Senator, in no coarse way, but in eloquent style and with force of argument, with regard to his policy establishing provisional governments. For awhile I hesitated to give my approval to that policy. It is not strange that I should hesitate, because I opposed the acts of usurpation which characterized to some extent the last Administration; but many of you Senators said these acts were right when the Constitution for the time being was not strictly regarded, when doubtful powers were exercised, and I can hardly see how you can find fault with the present Executive under circumstances of still greater embarrassment in the exercise of the powers to which he has resorted. I think the President did right in appointing provisional governors and setting up again the State governments; and why? I do not place it upon the war power. The war is over. It was over in May, when the President issued these proclamations and appointed these provisional governors. I cannot place it upon any war power.

But, sir, it was the duty of the President, as it is the duty of Congress, to guaranty to the States their republican form of government, and certainly that involves the guarantee of existence. When the war was over, when the people acknowledged themselves obedient to the laws of the country, these States were to some extent disorganized: at least they were not fully organized under this Government; their organization had relation more particularly to the southern confederacy. The President finding them in this disordered condition desired to bring them back, and he gave them all the aid and support he could in their efforts for that purpose. As an illustration, I will address the learned Senator from Ohio, the head of the Territorial Committee. In organizing a territorial government, where does he find the express power in the Constitution? He does not find it there. It is not written that Congress may establish a government for the Territories, nor can he find it in the power that gives control over the public lands. That relates to property; but Congress is authorized to admit new States into the Union. [Mr. WADE nodded assent.] I am glad that the distinguished Senator agrees with me in that proposition. Congress has power to admit new States into the Union, and under that power Congress may set up such a government for the time being, for the temporary purpose of enabling the people of a Territory to form a State government. If for the purpose of enabling the people to form a State constitution with a view to come into the Union, Congress may set up a provisional government in the Territory, why is it under the power, or the duty rather, which is imposed upon Congress and upon the President to guaranty the existence of the States already in the Union, that that power shall not be exercised by the President by setting up a provisional government to enable the people in all respects to place their States in proper relations to the Federal Government?

Mr. WADE. But suppose the State governments stood intact; then how came the power in the President? Suppose his doctrine is true; that the State governments already existed as soon as peace was established.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not sure that the President ever said that the State governments already stood in their proper position. I rather think that the Senator has used a word that the President did not.

Mr. WADE. I will ask the Senator what his doctrine is upon that subject.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought you referred to the opinion of a more important person. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. WADE. Because it would not do for the President of the United States to set up provisional governors in Indiana, Ohio, or any other State that had not seceded. Why is it that he has the power to do it in these southern States if they occupied the same position when the war was over as they did before?

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is very clear that the President cannot appoint a governor in Indiana nor in Ohio, because those States are in a perfect state of organization. A war has not disturbed the State organization. But I think the President holds, and I think it is true, that a State as a State cannot cease to exist. There may be a government de facto for four years, and when the government de jure returns it is established, and it then simply wants the organization, the machinery, and for the temporary purpose of enabling the people to act, the President furnishes them a provisional governor. Under this power I think the President was justified in appointing these governors, to enable the people to fully organize and set in motion the State governments and place the States in all respects in proper relation to the Federal Government.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a single question, if it is not going to embarrass him?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly. If I find it is embarrassing, I shall not answer it.

Mr. HOWE. Upon this point I have been extremely anxious to have some Senator explain what necessity there was for reorganizing what the Senator calls the government of one of those States. Take the State of South Carolina. What was the matter with the government of that State that it had to be reorganized? She having a Governor and her judges, having all the officers belonging to the government of a State, what was the necessity for reorganizing it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will answer that directly. I want to notice the position of my colleague, and in noticing that I think I shall answer the Senator from Wisconsin. My colleague says, taking the State of North Carolina for illustration, that North Carolina cannot be admitted here because she has not now a valid

State government which we can recognize, and he argues it thus: that the government of North Carolina up to 1861 was a State government under the Constitution and laws of the United States; that it was a valid government and a valid State constitution up to that time; then the war came and then there was a government established, he says, for the purpose of placing that State in relations with the southern confederacy, and the effect of that was to abolish, repeal, or abrogate the old law. I do not know about that. I think that the laws of a government de facto continue in force in relation to private interests and private matters and not political at all after the government de facto is gone, and will be respected by the government de jure; but a law or constitution that is political in its character, that was connected with the revolution, that was for the purpose of putting the State in relations with the southern confederacy, was ab initio invalid, it being part of the political machine which we do not regard as ever having had any validity. Then, I cannot quite see how an invalid constitution, established by the people during the rebellion for the purpose of placing the State in relations with the southern confederacy, had the power and force to abrogate and abolish a constitution valid up to that time. But I do not choose to consider that question. He may be right about that. But then he says that after the confederacy fell the constitution that is now over the State of North Carolina had no legitimate origin, has no validity, and therefore does not place the State in proper relation to the United States Government. I believe I have his assent that that is a correct statement of his proposition.

Now, sir, I do not believe that President Johnson himself could establish a State government. All that he could do was under the obligation to guaranty the existence of a State and its republican form. All that he could do would be to place the people, as far as was in his power, in a position to act themselves. When he does that, he appoints a provisional governor. That provisional governor calls a Legislature together. He has no power to call a Legislature; but under that call the people elect a Legislature, and that Legislature calls a convention, if you please, or the governor calls a convention and the people of that State respond to the call, and a convention representing the people fully and fairly is held for the purpose of establishing a State constitution, and that constitution is submitted to the people and approved by them in a fair vote. While it might be questioned whether the act of the governor in his proclamation for a Legislature and in his proclamation for a convention had any validity, yet, when the people acted upon it, and the people themselves establish a State constitution, it becomes as firm as the judgment and the will of the people can make it; and that, too, upon the common principle of law that a man may assume to be your agent and to transact your business and have no authority to do it whatever, yet if you approve his act it becomes your valid act.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator does not quite touch the point. What I want to know of the Senator is, what necessity there was for setting aside, for instance, Governor Magrath, who was elected by the people of South Carolina, I do not recollect in what year, perhaps in 1863 or 1864, and authorizing the same people to elect a new Governor? Has the Senator any reason for supposing that the people who elected Mr. Orr to be Governor of South Carolina in 1865 were dissatisfied with the election which they had made a short time before of Mr. Magrath? If they were not dissatisfied, where was the necessity for the President to authorize the same people who had elected Magrath to elect a new Governor?

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is not precisely upon the point I am discussing; but I shall attempt to answer the Senator. Governor Magrath was a part of the political movement establishing a southern confederacy.

Mr. HOWE. Now, what was the guilt, the name given to the crime which that involved him in, and what was the legal punishment for it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not discussing that question. That question the Senator knows very well goes before the courts. I might ask the Senator whether there can be treason after belligerency is recognized; but I am not going to be called off, and it is not fair, allow me to say, to try to divert a Senator from his argument by asking him something that may be regarded as sharp. It has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. HOWE. No, Mr. President—

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will not be interrupted further. Whether Governor Magrath was a traitor or not has nothing to do with the question as to whether the constitution of North Carolina is now valid. I am always willing and very well pleased to have Senators interrupt me in the few remarks I occasionally make, but I want it to be upon the subject I am discussing. That is fair to me; it is fair to the subject.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him right upon the point, if I understand it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. I understand the Senator to say that though the act of the President appointing provisional governors might not have any special validity, yet when the people of a State acted upon it by electing a Legislature and Governor, it would be a valid act of the people. I want to inquire how it was that after the people had elected a Governor in some of these States and elected a Legislature, the President still, in defiance of what the people in those States had done, kept the provisional governor in power and refused to recognize the Legislature until they had done certain things.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is not the question I am discussing either, Mr. President.

Mr. CLARK. Then I misapprehended the question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator did misapprehend the question. If the President of the United States attempted to control the action of the Legislature where the Legislature was fully organized, and after the people had elected their Governor pursuant to his plan, it was an act which he was not justified, in my judgment, in doing under the circumstances.

Mr. CLARK. I have my question answered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is my answer. It is nothing but an opinion. No doubt he thought whatever he did was right. I say the President had a right to do what was necessary to be done to place the people, in their disorganized condition, in a position to continue the State of North Carolina as a State and place it in proper relations with the United States. Then the States had to be placed in proper relations to the Federal Government, and the President has attempted to do that. Now—I do not care about the Senator answering now, but at his leisure—I will ask the Senator from Wisconsin this question: if the President could not confer any legal power upon the provisional governor, and the provisional governor without any legal authority called a convention, and the people responded by electing delegates, and the delegates made a constitution which the people indorsed, is that not a valid constitution?

Mr. HOWE. I should like to answer the question now, if the Senator would prefer it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well; I have no objection.

Mr. HOWE. If that was a State in which that thing was done, like the State of Ohio and the State of New York, where the people have prescribed in their organic acts when and how their constitutions may be altered, and the President of the United States had interfered, and in defiance of the provisions of their organic act had summoned the people, or a part of the people, to form a new constitution, and set up a new government overthrowing the existing one, I should say it was utterly illegal, utterly void, and revolutionary. That is what I should say if South Carolina was such a State as these. I do not say these acts are to be characterized in that way, because I say South Carolina was not a State.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator is known to us all as quite as clear-headed a gentleman as we could find anywhere, and it is astonishing that it requires so many "ifs" to answer a straight question.

Mr. HOWE. Only one.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The question was, if the people of the State have elected the convention, do not they breathe validity into the acts of that convention; and especially if the constitution is submitted to them and they vote for it, do they not breathe the breath of political life and power into that instrument? There is as far as I choose to go. There is where I rest it. The President, for the purpose of placing the people in a position to place their State governments in proper relations to the Federal Government, has done what he did, and then the people take it up, and they make the State constitution—a thing that no President can do. It is the voice of the people that makes a State government. Then that State government is established, established at the request of the President, if you please. Why is not that a valid constitution and State government? That is the argument that I present to my colleague. He took the ground that the governor being appointed without sufficient authority on the part of the President, and issuing a proclamation that he could not properly issue, therefore no legal government could result from it. Sir, how does the State of California appear here to-day? After the conquest from Mexico she never had a territorial government. Her birth was in military rule. A military commander inaugurated proceedings, and then the people took hold and established a State constitution, and Congress took the people of the State by the hand, not because the military governor had any power, not that he was appointed military governor, but that the people had acted upon his suggestion and the act of the people made a valid and powerful State government, which is now the pride of the Union.

Mr. President, this doctrine of my colleague, that there are no States in the South, that they are lost stars, that they have gone out of existence, I think one of the most dangerous heresies of those times, and if persisted in will lead us over a precipice that I hope neither we nor our children shall ever see. The distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Gurnie] told you the other day that you could not govern eight million people without representation. Do you think you can, permanently? If so, the men of 1866 are not the men of 1776. Three million people because they were taxed without representation defied the power of England and threw down defiance at her feet. Does any Senator suppose it is possible to govern so large a country as the South, so numerous a population, so brave a people, so gallant a people as they have shown themselves to be in this contest with the grandest people on earth, our northern soldiers? No, sir, it cannot be done. They must be brought into relations with this Government in every respect.

But, Mr. President, I ask my colleague and I ask other Senators, how is it that you maintain the doctrine? This war commenced in April, 1861, with the firing on Fort Sumter. Shortly after that there was a battle across the river here, at Bull Run. A few days after that Congress passed a resolution declaring the purpose and policy of the Government in the prosecution of the war, and I will read it. Although it has been so frequently read in this body, yet it is a necessary part of any argument that can be made on the subject:

"That this war is not prosecuted upon our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and all laws made in pursuance thereof, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

That was the battle-cry. When Congress passed that resolution almost unanimously—my colleague, I believe, supporting it, he then being a Senator from the State of Indiana—it was as if printed upon every banner at the head of every regiment of your Army; and wherever those banners were carried by the victorious hosts of the North that sentiment was carried. It was the boast of the soldier; it was the boast of the brave commander everywhere that this was not a war of oppression, that this was not a war of subjugation, but it was a war to bring the States again into their proper relations to the United States, and that they should be brought in with all their rights, privileges, and dignity unimpaired. That is what you said to the country, Senators; that is what the State Department said in its correspondence to the nations of the earth. And again, sir, President Lincoln, a year and a half later, in a proclamation to the country, dated September 22, 1862, used this language:

"I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States of America, and Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy thereof, do hereby proclaim and declare that hereafter as heretofore the war will be prosecuted for the object of practically restoring the constitutional relation between the United States and each of the States, and the people thereof, in which States that relation is or may be suspended or disturbed."

The purpose of the war, he said, was simply to bring the States into practical relations again to the Government. In various acts you have recognized these States; I will not trouble the Senate to repeat their provisions—among them were the act apportioning representation, and the act imposing taxes upon the people of the different States, and that act again referred to in the laws of 1864. These are instances in which Congress has recognized the States, but the great controlling action of Congress upon this subject is this resolution of 1861.

Mr. President, you said to the gallant men in the ranks, "You are not called upon to fight in a war of aggression, you are called upon to hold up the Constitution of your country, you are called upon to fight to restore this Union, not to destroy;" and in that cause and for that cause they went forth; they fought the battles; and now that the battles have been fought, and now that they come home, many of them wounded and scarred, after standing upon the rough edge of a hundred battles, can you, Senators, take that assurance back from them; can you now say to them that this was not a war for the restoration of the Union, but it was a war for conquest, and we will hold these States as subjugated and conquered provinces? When you do that you violate the highest faith of the nation, not only to the soldiers of the North, but the faith of the nation to the loyal men in the southern States, the faith of the nation to all the nations of the earth.

How did my colleague, how did other Senators, come to vote a few weeks ago for a bill which you all admitted was not constitutional except under the provisions of the constitutional amendment? The chairman of the committee who presented that bill said that the bill was not constitutional except for that amendment. He did not claim constitutionality for it unless that amendment was a part of the Constitution of the United States; and when did the amendment become a part of the Constitution? When was it adopted? When it received the vote of a portion of these southern States, together with the northern States, Mr. Seward published to the world that this amendment was adopted, because, of the thirty-six States, three fourths of them had agreed to it. You Senators who claim that these States are out of the Union, are willing to act upon a constitutional amendment which has no validity unless you recognize the action of those States in respect to it. You vote upon it. You say in the most solemn manner possible that these States are competent to approve a constitutional amendment, and you therefore adopt it as a part of the Constitution; but now you say they are not in the Union to be represented. Is that right?

But my colleague with great ingenuity has referred to two instances in which he says Congress has ignored the existence of these States. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] proposed a resolution that a quorum of the Senate consists of a majority of the Senators duly chosen. My colleague says that these States were not represented in the Senate at the time their existence was ignored by the adoption of this rule in the body. I think not; the Senate at the time thought not. That was adopted May 4, 1864. The Constitution provides that a majority of each House shall constitute a quorum. Now, what is a House? What is a House as applied to the Senate? A quorum of the Senate is a majority of the Senate. In respect to the other House there is no difficulty about this question, for the Constitution defines the House of Representatives as composed of "members chosen every second year." It is composed of members "chosen," not of members that might be chosen and those that are chosen, but of those who in fact are chosen. But the language of the Constitution in regard to the Senate is a little more difficult on this question. The Senate of the United States, the Constitution says, shall be composed of two Senators from each State chosen by the Legislature thereof for six years. The language is "chosen," and the Senate adopted this rule upon the ground that Senators who were chosen constitute the Senate as a body. It was upon that principle that the resolution was adopted, and I think the debate, which was mainly maintained by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] holds that ground. This resolution was not adopted upon any ground that the States were out of the Union, but upon the ground that the Senators who had been "chosen" composed the Senate.

But my distinguished colleague has referred to another instance which I think he will find a little unfortunate for himself. He refers to the joint resolution of last winter in which we denied a vote to Louisiana and Tennessee in the Electoral College for President and Vice President. That resolution was reported to this body by the distinguished Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] and it read:

"Whereas the inhabitants and local authorities of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee rebelled against the Government of the United States, and have continued in a state of armed rebellion for more than three years, and were in said state of armed rebellion on the 8th day of November, 1864: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the States mentioned in the preamble to this joint resolution are not entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President and Vice President of the United States for the term of office commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865; and no electoral votes shall be received or counted from said States concerning the choice of President and Vice President for said term of office."

My colleague holds that this resolution ignores the existence of these States as States. Let us see. The gentleman who reported the resolution offered an amendment to strike out from the preamble the words "and have continued in a state of armed rebellion for more than three years, and were in said state of armed rebellion on the 8th day of November, 1864," and to insert instead of them these words, "and were in such state of rebellion on the 8th day of November, 1864." The Senator from Illinois, in maintaining this resolution which he reported, said:

"The Committee on the Judiciary, by the amendment they have reported, propose to alter the preamble somewhat. The object of this alteration is to avoid as far as possible any commitment upon the subject which the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey brings up. The object of the amendment of the committee is simply to put the preamble in such form that if it is adopted, and the resolution passed, Congress will not have decided whether Louisiana is in the Union or out of the Union, whether she is a State or not a State. It will be time enough to decide that question when it is presented to us."

Now, I will call my colleague's attention to an amendment that was offered by the Senator from New Jersey, (Mr. Ten Eyck.) Mr. Ten Eyck said:

"I move to strike out of the preamble the word 'Louisiana.' I will simply state that it is a matter of history that the State of Louisiana has reorganized, or at least attempted to do so, and in the opinion of many, and perhaps most, of the loyal citizens of that State, has reorganized as a State."

He said further:

"My object in moving this amendment is, under this state of facts, that some opportunity may be afforded to a loyal people who have suffered all the horrors of the rebellion, who have got the better of it and put it under foot, of coming back and resuming their place in the councils of the nation."

That is what Mr. Ten Eyck said in support of his amendment; he said he wanted these people to have the right to vote for President of the United States; the resolution of the Senator from Illinois said that because of the rebellion on the 8th day of November, 1864, the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, Tennessee, and others, should not be allowed to cast a vote in the Electoral College for President and Vice President. The Senator from New Jersey, Mr. Ten Eyck, moved to strike Louisiana from the list, and to give her a right to vote for President and Vice President. That brought the very question up. In support of his amendment he urged that he wanted the loyal men of Louisiana to have an opportunity to place themselves properly in the Union, and that their voice should be heard. Some debate went on, and the vote was taken on Mr. Ten Eyck's amendment to strike out Louisiana from the disability, the effect of which would have been to allow her to vote for President and Vice President.

The vote being taken on the amendment was—yeas 16, nays 22.

The yeas were—

Messrs. Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Willey.

I voted against striking it out, for I did not think the government established there by General Banks at the point of the bayonet was such a government as we ought then to recognize. The question had been very fully discussed, and on those grounds I opposed it; but my colleague voted to strike Louisiana from the resolution, to allow Louisiana to cast her vote for the President of the United States in the Electoral College; and upon what ground? He now says she is not in the Union; she is a lost star again wandering beyond the observance of any judicial telescope. That is her present condition; she is not to come here and plead her cause; but last year before it was announced that political power was to be held and permanently secured before Louisiana or any other southern State should come back, my colleague then voted as he thought was right, that Louisiana was a State in the Union, and that her vote for President cast on the 8th day of November, 1864, was a valid vote that ought to be counted. How is it that she is out of the Union now, but was in this Union then? I shall not pursue that argument further.

When, I ask, does my colleague propose that these States may come back? Is this Union permanently dissolved? My colleague repeats the question and says, "They cannot be admitted at present with benefit to themselves or safety to the nation," and he adds:

"And the resurrection trumpet shall sound the summons of these rebels to the general judgment before my voice or vote shall summon them to these halls."

"But, Mr. President, gentlemen ask us, when shall these States be restored?"

Yes, Mr. President, gentlemen ask that; two hundred and sixty thousand voters in Indiana ask it to-day; one hundred thousand soldiers in Indiana ask the question; the soldiers all over this country ask the question, when shall the fruit be gathered for which we plowed southern soil? When is this Union to be restored for which we fought and left many a comrade in a lonely grave behind? That is the question that is being asked, and it is a question, Senators will allow me to say, which must be answered. When? My colleague says when the judgment trumpet shall sound, not before, will he admit rebels. Then a generation must pass away. I say come back now; in all cases where the people of the southern States have formed State governments, have maintained peace and obeyed the law, and ask that their States shall be placed in proper relation to the Federal Government, I say now, I say now as an avoidance of future trouble, restore the Union at once.

But, Mr. President, my colleague asks for some more blood. He says:

"But, Mr. President, gentlemen ask us, when shall these States be restored? Not by my vote, until all these constitutional guarantees are placed utterly beyond all recall."

When is that to be? That is distinct enough. All these constitutional amendments must pass the ordeal of Congress and then go before the States and take the round of years until twenty-seven of the States approve them; and not till then will my distinguished colleague hear the petition of the States of the Union at the door of the Capitol—

"Not until the leading traitors in this rebellion shall have been punished, and shall have met the felon's doom."

That is to be in the way. If the President will not cause to be hung all the men that my colleague thinks ought to be hung, he will not let the States come back at all! Upon what ground is that based?

But, Mr. President, we hear a good deal said about blood now. Yesterday the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] criticised the President for his leniency toward the South. A few days ago the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] made a severe criticism on the President for his leniency, and my colleague asks for blood. Mr. President, this war commenced with blood; ay, blood was demanded before the war. When the good men and the patriotic, North and South, representing the yearning hearts of the people at home, came here in the winter and spring of 1861 in a peace congress, if possible to avoid this dreadful war, right then the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] announced to his Governor and the country that this Union was scarcely worth preserving without some blood-letting. His cry before the war was for blood. Allow me to say that when the Senator's name is forgotten because of anything he says or does in this body, in future time it will be borne down upon the pages of history as the author of the terrible sentiment, that the Union of the people that our fathers had cemented by the blood of the Revolution and by the love of the people; that that Union, resting upon compromise and concession, resting upon the doctrine of equality to all sections of the country; that that Union which brought us so much greatness and power in the three quarters of a century of our life; that that Union that had brought us so much prosperity and greatness until we were the mightiest and proudest nation on God's footstool; that that grand Union was not worth preserving unless we had some blood-letting.

Mr. President, it is not the sentiment of the Senator's own heart; it is the expression of a bitter political hostility; but it will carry him down to immortality; he is sure of living in history; he has gained that much by it. Sir, the thirst was for blood before the war, and now that the war is over, that these people have fallen upon their knees in your presence and say, "We are a conquered people, we acknowledge it, we promise our allegiance to the Government, we promise obedience to the law, we have sent our soldiers home, we call for no armies in our midst to keep us in obedience to the law, we ask again that our States shall come back into the council chamber of the nation," and the cry is, "Blood! blood! blood!"

Mr. SHERMAN. I would like to ask the honorable Senator a single question—whether he thinks it is an unreasonable demand for us, who are the victors in the contest, to say to them that we are willing to let them come back into the Union on precisely an equal footing with ourselves, man for man, woman for woman, child for child. All we propose to say to them is, that if by their law they will exclude from all political power a race who have aided us, we will not allow them to exercise political power for that race. That, as I understand it, is the whole question. Now, I ask the honorable Senator to say whether he thinks that is a hard condition to impose on them in coming back into the Union?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I spent about half an hour, I think, of the time of the Senate, which I have occupied in discussing that very question, and trying to show why I thought it was not right and it was not expedient for the United States Government to attempt to control the right of suffrage in the States. If I failed in the course of that argument to satisfy the Senator, I cannot do it now, as I am about closing my argument. I am now discussing the question made by my colleague, whether these States shall be kept out until all the leaders of the rebellion have met a felon's doom. That is the proposition. I resist it. I ask that these States shall come in now. Congress has no control over the punishment of anybody; that is with the Executive, if the Executive has any control over it at all, or it is with the judiciary. You can judge for yourselves whether the reasons given by Chief Justice Chase why he will not hold courts in Virginia are satisfactory or not. You can judge for yourselves of the reasons given by the Attorney General of the United States why the trial of Mr. Davis cannot take place outside of Virginia. I do not choose to discuss these questions. If my colleague and other Senators are not satisfied with the decision of the Attorney General, let them go and argue it with him. I have not taken time to decide it for myself. The Attorney General says that he cannot be tried properly outside of Virginia. I do not suppose that any Senator asks that anybody shall be punished except upon some trial. You do not want anybody to go to Fortress Monroe and shoot Jefferson Davis. If you want it done, let the man who wants it done in that way go and do it. I want him and all others that are to be punished to be put upon trial before a court having jurisdiction of the cause; where the proceedings, where the finding, where the execution may be worthy of the great country and the great people with which we are connected.

But, Mr. President, these Senators want more blood, and they do not like the course of the President of the United States; and how is it between them and the President? I have spoken of the Senator from Oregon, he living out in the shades of the mountains, and beyond them, and his people having seen but little of the hardships and terrors of this war. They scarcely knew of it. The sound of the cannon could not pass beyond the mountains. They would scarcely know of it if the tax-gatherer did not go there. The Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] my colleague, ask for more punishment upon rebels than the President is willing to give. How do they know the war?

Mr. HOWARD. I ask the Senator from Indiana what measure it is for which I have voted or spoken that he refers to. I certainly presented a resolution in this body recommending respectfully to the President of the United States that he should put Jefferson Davis and others upon trial, not for treason, but for the crime of assassinating the late President of the United States, because the Secretary of War in an official report made to the President states expressly that he stands in that Department charged with the crime of inciting that assassination. Now, sir, I ask the Senator from Indiana whether he would or would not, if it were in his power, put Jefferson Davis and his accomplices upon trial for that atrocious crime; and if he would not, upon what ground it is that he has the assurance to charge other honorable men on this floor with thirsting for blood, more blood, a cry that is too ridiculous to receive any further answer.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator from Michigan is through I will answer him. If I were an officer of the Government upon whom the responsibility of deciding the question was thrown by the laws, and there was evidence before me that Jefferson Davis had been guilty of the offense of which the Senator speaks, I should certainly order him to be put upon trial, if I had the authority so to order, before some court that had jurisdiction of the case; and if the penalty was death, found by a court having jurisdiction, I should feel it my duty, and as pleasant a duty of that sort as the law could impose, to see that the penalty was executed.

Mr. HOWARD. Upon what ground, then, does he charge other Senators who have supported the measure to which I have referred with merely thirsting for more blood? If that is his opinion; if he is willing to take blood, and would take it with pleasure, as he says he would, upon what ground does he make it a matter of reproach against others here that they would do the same thing?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator has used one word that is not for the Senate, and if he were twice as old as he is I would throw it back to him. He asks upon what grounds I have the assurance to say a thing. Sir, I do whatever I think is right here, and in respect to it the Senator cannot use the word "assurance." [Applause in the galleries.] He is not entitled to do so. [Renewed applause.] Do not let him dictate to me. I have treated this subject fairly, and if he does not want to be included among the Senators who have asked for blood I exclude him from that category. I have made my remarks now to my colleague; I have been discussing my colleague's proposition, which I read and I will read it again. The question which my colleague asked in his argument, and which he answered for himself, was this:

"But, Mr. President, gentlemen ask us, when shall the States be restored? Not by my vote until all these constitutional guarantees are placed utterly beyond all recall; not until the leading traitors in this rebellion shall have been punished and shall have met the felon's doom."

The felon's doom is death, and this Union is not to be restored until that work is done!

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Will my colleague pardon me for interrupting him for a moment?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. My colleague surely does not intend to represent me as asking for the blood of these felons, except by a trial. I have never for a moment entertained such a thought. I have no doubt whatever that a military commission has full authority to try them; but without trial and without conviction, I should demand the blood of no man.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not understand my colleague as being in favor of somebody going and shooting them without authority. I am discussing the question whether he can, as a Senator here, say, "The President has been too lenient, he has not tried enough men, and I will not consent to his policy for the restoration of these States until there is more blood shed." I deny that proposition. If these States are here clothed with the rights of States, and their Senators come here with the proper certificates showing their election, neither my colleague nor any other Senator, in my judgment, has the right to say to these States, "Go back until some felons are executed."

Sir, the President of the United States has shown a great deal of leniency. When he came into power I was afraid that the extreme would be the other way. Consider the difference of position between the Senators on this floor, who criticise the President on this question, and the President himself. I say with all kindness and respect, that I think they have not considered the position the President has been thrown into during this war. These Senators of the North have friends and relatives to mourn for as we all have, but otherwise they have the prosperity that attended the war in our section of the country, enhanced prices of property, the results of an inflated currency. They have had prosperity in the North, from this cause, for a time. They have had political power. They have placed one star upon one man's shoulders; two stars, by their political influence and recommendations, upon another man's shoulders. They have enjoyed power, safety, peace, quiet at home, and high positions of honor here in the Senate; while Andrew Johnson, a citizen of Eastern Tennessee, when the war broke out, rallied the Union men around him. They stood their position among the mountains, as my colleague said the other day, as long as it could be held, he, during that time, enduring scorn, derision, and threats of his foes. Finally danger became so imminent that he had to leave his State, an exile, and wander in other States for two years, to seek that safety and that quiet which he could not enjoy at home. Stung by personal abuse, his property gone, stung by being driven out of his home an exile, his family scarcely safe at home, brought, by the providence of God, to be President of the United States, he can be lenient and kind. He forgets for the time being his personal wrongs. He forgets any party allegiance in that high obligation and duty which he owes to his country. He wants to restore this Union. He wants these people to come together. I was taught by a soldier one night, in traveling from the city of New York to Philadelphia and onward west to my home, a lesson which I do not expect soon to forget. I fell into conversation with him. I found that he was from the camp in front of Petersburg. Among other things, he told me that the soldiers frequently stood together upon the lines of each army and fell into conversation, and they talked. One asked the other, "Don't you wish this was over and we could go home?" The reply from the enemy would be, "It would delight my heart." Said the soldier to me, "Stranger, if Abraham Lincoln and Jefferson Davis could stand together, face to face, as we soldiers stand face to face on the border line between the camp, and talk as we talk, this war could be closed in one month."

Now, sir, that soldier knew what was in the heart of man. He knew that kindness and conciliation could frequently bring peace when it would take long months of bloodshed to do so. But the bloodshed is over; the armies are disbanded; we are in a state of peace; and the President says that the resolution of 1861, which you Senators adopted, ought to be carried out. It is the pledge of Congress; it is the pledge of the Department of State to foreign nations; it is the pledge made to the Army, to the country, to the world, that when this war is over all these States shall come in with all their dignity, rights, and powers unimpaired. Mr. Johnson, President of the United States, standing upon that resolution, says, "Let them come." He has recognized them in all the relations to the Government to which he is competent to recognize them. The duty is ours, he says, to complete the work. It is a high duty. It is a duty, brother Senators, that we cannot discharge as partisans. It is too great a duty to discharge in that spirit, and I was astounded when I saw in the advocacy of this resolution the perpetuity of the power of the Republican party urged as a reason. We are in times that do not admit of that consideration.

Mr. President, my colleague referred to our public debt, I believe, and to the pensions to the soldiers, &c., as a reason why we ought not to admit Senators and Representatives from these southern States. I believe he intimated that these States being represented our public debt would become insecure, and the public credit impaired, on the ground that they might not vote for the necessary revenue. I look upon that question from another stand-point. What is the security for the public debt? The debt is large; but if the right policy be pursued it is not beyond the power of the people to pay. I am not for repudiation. I consider repudiation a deep disgrace. But where is the guarantee for that debt? Huge as it is, what is the guarantee? Peace, prosperity to the people. If you send out your duplicates into the country for the collection of $350,000,000 every year, must you not have a prosperous people at home to meet that demand; and what shall bring us prosperity but union, cordial, hearty, permanent, so that we of the West can seek our natural market along the shores of the Mississippi and the Gulf, so that the people of the North may buy their cotton, their sugar, and the staples of the South from that section, so that commerce shall return to its ancient channels? These are some of the assurances. And in the judgment of the world, what is the highest guarantee? A united people under the Constitution that all do love and respect. Let it be announced over this world that these States are again cordially united, that there is no longer schism or discord in our ranks, then, indeed, the credit of this Government will be established; but if it goes abroad that this Union cannot be restored, that the war has failed, that we keep the States out, that we intend to govern them by military power, let any sentiment of that sort go abroad, and as that sentiment gains power and influence in the country our credit must go down.

Does any Senator here fear foreign Powers? I do not. I do not think we need have any foreign wars. But we want foreign nations to respect us, and that is the best guarantee for peace. Let them know that they cannot hurt us, but we can hurt them, and we have the highest assurance for respect and peace from all nations. Now, sir, what is the best guarantee we can give? What is the best assurance to foreign nations? It is that we are able under all circumstances to defend ourselves. Let us be a united people, united heart and hand, the Constitution governing all over the land, the flag everywhere respected, men cordially heart to heart again. When that time comes foreign nations will look upon us as again one of the established Powers of the earth to be respected, and we will have peace.

This is the gravest question that has ever been discussed in America. Nothing like it has before been presented. The discussions of this Congress, in my judgment, will go down as the most important pages of American history. As we decide this question it may be—I will not prophesy—but it may be the most important decision ever made in this Government from the time our fathers agreed to lay the Articles of Confederation aside and adopt the Constitution of 1789. Why cannot we let these States come in? Are party considerations to govern us? Certainly not. What shall govern us, then? Are you afraid of the vote of Senators and Representatives from the South, that they will prevent your doing what is right in respect to the laws? When shall that cease? You have, as you claim, a strong guarantee here; you will not allow a man to come into this Chamber unless he takes the test oath. Is not that guarantee enough? These States have laid down their arms, they have complied with all the conditions required in the resolution of 1861. They come and ask again for representation. You say "No, no, no; we will not hear you, we will not even give you the courtesy of seats upon this floor."

Is that policy? Is it right? I know many have been traitors, (whether it can be defined treason in the courts is a question about which men differ,) but they have been guilty of moral treason in organizing a rebellion; but they have been conquered, and what is right between man and man, as a general thing, is right among nations and people. If either one of the Senators have a controversy with his neighbor, and it comes to blows, or even to weapons, and after the fiercest strife you disarm him, and have him entirely in your power, and he sues for mercy, I know there is not a Senator who would deny it. You would not say that you will lift the point of your dagger from his breast, and that you will let him up again if he will give you certain guarantees. No, you would say, "You are my conquered enemy; you acknowledge it; and I go no further in this contest;" and if attacked by another you will stand by him. That is human nature; it is honorable; it is right. Here are States that lay down all arms of opposition and ask to be admitted into the Union. Do not Senators believe the prospects of our country would be brighter at home and abroad, that every interest would be promoted by letting them come in? Mr. President, I shall do all in my power in a sense of right and duty and obligation to the country to restore these States. I hope that it will not have to go to the country as a political question, but I am not afraid of the judgment of the country upon it. The people say the war is over and the States ought to be in. Peace is here and we ought to have the results of peace. I am not afraid of the people if this is to be made a question, but I seek no such question. In good faith I ask that these States shall come in. I believe they have a common interest in our prosperity, and our destiny may depend upon it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana has arraigned me upon an old indictment for having written a certain letter in 1861. It is not the first time that I have been arraigned on that indictment of "blood-letting." I was first arraigned for it upon this floor by the traitor John C. Breckinridge, and I answered the traitor John C. Breckinridge, and after I gave him his answer he went out into the rebel ranks and fought against our flag. I was arraigned by another Senator from Kentucky, and by other traitors upon this floor. I expect to be arraigned again. I wrote the letter, and I stand by the letter; and what was in it?

What was the position of the country when that letter was written? The Democratic party, as an organization, had arrayed itself against this Government—a Democratic traitor in the presidential chair and a Democratic traitor in every department of this Government, Democratic traitors preaching treason upon this floor and preaching treason in the Hall of the other House, Democratic traitors in your Army and in your Navy, Democratic traitors controlling every branch of this Government. Your flag was fired upon, and there was no response. The Democratic party had ordained that this Government should be overthrown, and I, a Senator from the State of Michigan, wrote to the Governor of that State, "Unless you are prepared to shed blood for the preservation of this great Government, the Government is overthrown." That is all there was to that letter. That I said, and that I say again, and I tell that Senator if he is prepared to go down in history with the Democratic traitors who then cooperated with him, I am prepared to go down on that "blood-letting" letter, and I stand by the record as then made. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) Order!

Mr. CHANDLER. What was the condition of the country when that letter was written? Sir, you had a band of Democratic traitors organized in this town as the National Rifles drilling every night to overthrow this Government by a mob. You had the Democratic traitor Buchanan in command of your navy-yard, where all your munitions of war were stored. You had the Democratic traitor Robert E. Lee in your War Department at that very moment. And now I am to be arraigned here as a blood-thirsty individual because when these Democratic traitors stood here in these Halls and proclaimed that this Government was overthrown, that they would not live with us in any event; because I wrote to the Governor of my State that unless he was prepared to shed blood for the preservation of this Government it was overthrown, now I am to be arraigned as going down to be remembered in history! Yes, sir, I shall be remembered, and I am proud of the record. May it stand, and stand as long as this Government stands. When that Senator and the men who cooperated with him shall have gone down to eternal infamy my record will be brilliant. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suspend his remarks? The Chair has repeatedly called the galleries to order; and if applause or any demonstration of this kind be repeated, he will feel it his duty to clear the galleries.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will take a future occasion to respond to this blood-letting accusation. I did not expect to make any remarks this afternoon. I have risen merely on the spur of the occasion; but at some future day I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to go on with this subject.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President—
Mr. HOWE. If the Senator from Illinois will permit me to say a word, not interfering with the right of the Senator from Illinois to the floor, but simply to make an explanation of a little matter that occurred during the remarks of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. YATES. I yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. HOWE. I rise not for the purpose of replying to the speech of the Senator from Indiana, for I have not had the advantage of listening to it all; but I was in the Senate a short time and by his permission put one or two questions to him. The question I wished to have answered particularly, to enable me to understand what necessity in his judgment existed for overthrowing the political organizations which were known as the governments of the rebelling States when the rebellion was suppressed, and when their armies surrendered. I put that question to the Senator, and he attempted to answer it. In the course of his answer, I thought I could induce him to be more explicit by interposing another question, which was as to the particular crime that the Governor of South Carolina had committed when he allied himself to the rebellion and to that political organization known as the confederacy. The Senator pronounced that question to be unfair to him, because he said that he was not prepared to enter into the discussion of the question whether Governor Magrath could be tried for treason or not. I rose for the purpose of explaining the purport of that question, seeing clearly that he misunderstood it. The Senator very abruptly refused to allow me to make the explanation. I think I can call him to the stand as a witness that I am not in the habit of pressing questions which are unfair. I did not mean to interpose one then which could be objected to upon any such ground.

What I wished to call his attention to was this one peculiarity of our Government: I do understand that it is essential to the character of an American State that it should have the right to choose its Governors. When the people of a State have chosen a Governor, I understand that two rights are secured: first, the right of that man to be Governor during the term for which he is chosen, and second, the right of the people to have his services as Governor. Now, in some year, I do not recollect when, the people of South Carolina, who he says constitute the State, chose Mr. Magrath for Governor. If South Carolina remained a State with the rights of a State, I think the right was secured to Mr. Magrath to continue Governor of that State during his term; and the right was secured to the people to have him for Governor. If Mr. Magrath committed a crime against that State, the government of that State might impose upon him the punishment which the law affixed to that crime; and so if he committed a crime against the United States, the Government of the United States might impose upon him the punishment that is by law affixed to the commission of that crime. But Governor Magrath was not arrested, as I know, not tried, not sentenced by any of the tribunals of South Carolina to be deposed from the office of Governor. Nevertheless he was in fact deposed from that office, and he was deprived of the emoluments and honors of it; and the people who had elected him were deprived of the right to have his services as Governor. I wanted the Senator from Indiana to explain why it was that all that was done. I did not put the question from any idea that it was a difficult question to answer; for I think I could answer it very readily and very satisfactorily to myself; but I thought that arguing from the Senator's stand-point it would be a difficult question for him to answer. It was that question I wished him to answer. I did not wish to draw him off in any discussion whether Mr. Magrath could be tried for treason or not.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President—

Mr. NESMITH. I ask my friend from Illinois to give way to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to suggest that there is special reason for a short executive session, and I hope we shall be allowed to have one.

Mr. NESMITH. I withdraw my motion for that purpose.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the State of Ohio, relative to the assumption by the General Government of the war debt of the several States.

The SPEAKER. That joint resolution was presented yesterday and referred.

Mr. GARFIELD. I thought it was objected to.

The SPEAKER. Only the reading of the resolution in extenso was objected to.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I withdraw the joint resolution.

Mr. BLAINE, from the select committee on the war debt of the loyal States, reported back a bill to reimburse the loyal States for advances made and debts contracted in support of the war for the preservation of the Union in an amended form, and moved that it be recommended, with accompanying papers, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending section three of the act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to grant pensions approved July 14, 1862,' approved July 4, 1864," so as to allow declarations to be made and testimony taken before officers duly qualified to administer oaths without going before a court of record, or some officer thereof having custody of the seal, in case of physical disability of the claimant to go before such court or officer.

LINCOLN MEMORIAL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to submit a privileged report.

In pursuance of the concurrent resolutions of the two Houses of Congress on the 12th of February instant, the chairman of the joint committee of arrangements on the memorial exercises of the late President of the United States, Abraham Lincoln, have placed a certified copy of said concurrent resolutions in the hands of Hon. George Bancroft, and have requested of him a copy of his address on the occasion referred to for publication, as will appear from the following correspondence, which I move be read, and that it lie on the table, and be printed.

The Clerk read, as follows:

THE CAPITOL,
WASHINGTON, February 13, 1866.

Sir: We have the honor to present to you an official copy of two concurrent resolutions adopted by the Senate and House of Representatives on the 12th instant, expressing the thanks of Congress for the appropriate memorial address delivered by you on the life and services of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States, and instructing us to request from you a copy of the address for publication.

Having shared the high gratification of hearing the address, we take pleasure, in accordance with the second of the concurrent resolutions, in requesting you to furnish a copy of the address for publication.

We have the honor to be, with very great respect, your obedient servants.

SOLOMON FOOT.

Chairman on the part of the Senate.

E. B. WASHBURN,

Chairman on the part of the House.

To Hon. GEORGE BANCROFT.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 14, 1866.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your letter of yesterday, and a copy of the two concurrent resolutions of Congress to which you refer. The thanks of the Senate and House of Representatives for the performance of the duty assigned me I value as a very distinguished honor, and I shall cheerfully furnish a copy of the address for publication.

I remain, gentlemen, very sincerely yours,

GEORGE BANCROFT.

Hon. SOLOMON FOOT.

Chairman on the part of the Senate.

Hon. E. B. WASHBURN.

Chairman on the part of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that twenty thousand extra copies of the oration and correspondence be printed for the use of the House.

The SPEAKER stated that the motion, under the law, would be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he will allow the Dred Scott decision to be printed with it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir; I do not think that ought to be extended.

Mr. ROGERS. It is a contest between the Supreme Court and Mr. Bancroft, and I would like the people to have both sides.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That has been decided and passed upon finally.

Mr. WENTWORTH. The Dred Scott decision has gone with its author.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE GRANTED.

Mr. ORTH moved that leave of absence be granted to his colleague, Mr. HILL, for ten days.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

BOOKS.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be published for the use of the members of this House, by W. H. & O. H. Morrison, of Washington, one thousand copies of the book entitled "Memorial Record of the Nation's Tribute to Abraham Lincoln" and published together with the address of Hon. George Bancroft delivered February 12, 1866; said publication to be in strict conformity with section five of act of Congress passed August 16, 1853, which provides as follows:

"If any books shall hereafter be ordered to and received by members of Congress, the price paid for the same shall be deducted from the compensation hereinafter provided for such member or members: Provided, however, That this shall not extend to books ordered to be printed by the Public Printer during the Congress for which said member shall be elected."

Mr. LAFLIN. This resolution has two objects: first, that the publishers of the book in question may be enabled to ascertain how many of the members of this House desire the publication of this book at their private expense; second, that the publishers of all books may be thus publicly informed that without repealing an act of Congress passed in 1856, it is not within the power of the House to order for the use of its members any books, except at the private expense of members. Those of the members that desire the publication of this book at their private expense will of course vote in the affirmative; those that are opposed to it will vote in the negative.

I may state here that this has no reference whatever to the resolution that has just been introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. UPSON. I would ask the gentleman whether this is reported for the first time, or on reference to the committee.

Mr. LAFLIN. It is in answer to a resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

I move the previous question on the adoption of this resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of this resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question being taken on the adoption of the resolution, it was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House disagreed to the resolution, and to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. UPSON. I rise to a question of privilege. I move that the House take up the contested-election case in the State of Pennsylvania, Coffroth vs. Koontz.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DAVIS. With the permission of the gentleman from Michigan, I ask leave of absence for three or four days.

No objection being made, leave of absence was granted.

PAYMENT FOR CAVALRY HORSES.

Mr. BROMWELL. I ask the gentleman from Michigan to allow me to offer a resolution.

Mr. UPSON. I yield for the last time to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BROMWELL. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment to non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates who served in the volunteer cavalry service during the late war, for horses furnished by them to the Government and lost without fault of the soldier, particularly in the following cases:

First, in cases in which during forced march, or retreat, or protracted engagement, or skirmishing, horses have been overcome by exercise and exhaustion, and have died in consequence.

Second, in cases in which horses have been captured by the enemy, without fault of the soldier, and when engaged in the line of his duty.

Third, in cases in which horses were ordered by commanding officers to be shot or otherwise destroyed on account of infirmities caused by over-exercise and exhaustion in necessary and proper service.

And that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. THORNTON. I desire to make a suggestion to my colleague. This same subject was referred by a resolution heretofore introduced to the Committee on Military Affairs, and reported back to the House and referred to the Committee of Claims. The subject embraced in this resolution is now under consideration by the Committee of Claims, and I suggest to my colleague that he had better send his resolution to that committee.

Mr. BROMWELL. I will modify my resolution so as to refer the question to the Committee of Claims.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. UPSON resumed the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to say to the gentleman from Michigan that I hold in my hand a number of petitions referred improperly to the Committee on Military Affairs. They ought to go to the appropriate committees, to be reported on when the committees are called, and I ask him to permit me to have them referred to the proper committees.

Mr. UPSON. I will yield for that purpose.

AMENDMENT TO PENSION LAWS.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of a petition for increase of pension of soldiers who have lost an arm or a leg; and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

CLEMENT REEVES.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Clement Reeves for compensation for damages on account of the appropriation to its own use by the Government of the United States of a part of his land lying on the Delaware river, and the erection thereon of a fortification; and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

WOUNDED SOLDIERS.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of wounded soldiers, praying for increased pension; and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

GEORGE P. REMSBERG.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of George P. Remsberg, asking compensation for injuries received by his son at Frederick, Maryland; and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF WAR OF 1812.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the remonstrance of Samuel Lake, of Buffalo, New York, against the passage of an act granting pensions to soldiers of the war of 1812; and the same was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

PAYMENT OF COMMUTATION MONEY.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hold in my hand the petitions of John Marsh, Abraham Olger, and others, praying the refunding of commutation money paid by them respectively under the commutation law, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It has since been discovered that the only difficulty is that the parties have not made proper proof, and that the matter could be settled at the Department if they would amend the papers. I therefore move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions, and that the parties have leave to withdraw the papers.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. UPSON. I now yield for a moment to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] and then I will yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN HORN,] and after that I will yield no further.

RAILROAD ACCIDENTS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to punish for throwing trains from railroad tracks; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUNISHMENT OF LARCENIES, ETC.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, also by unanimous consent introduced a bill to punish larcenies and robberies of the securities and other choses in action belonging to the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

UNITED STATES REVENUE COURTS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to establish United States revenue courts, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DESCENDANTS OF JOSEPH SHERMAN.

On motion of Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, the Committee on Revolutionary Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition and papers of the descendants of Joseph Sherman and the officers of the Rhode Island infantry during the Revolution, and leave was granted for the withdrawal of the same from the files of the House.

PENNSYLVANIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. UPSON. I now call up the report of the Committee of Elections in the case of Alexander H. Coffroth and William H. Koontz of the sixteenth congressional district of Pennsylvania.

The following are the resolutions reported by the committee:

Resolved, That Alexander H. Coffroth, upon the certificates and papers relating to the election in the sixteenth congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania, has the prima facie right to the vacant seat from that district, and is entitled to take the oath of office and occupy a seat in this House as the Representative in Congress from said district, without prejudice to the right of William H. Koontz, claiming to have been duly elected thereto, to contest his right to said seat upon the merits.

Resolved, That William H. Koontz, desiring to contest the right of Hon. Alexander H. Coffroth to a seat in this House as a Representative from the sixteenth district of the State of Pennsylvania, be, and he is, required to serve upon the said Coffroth, within fifteen days after the passage of this resolution, a particular statement of the grounds of said contest, and that the said Coffroth be, and he is hereby, required to serve upon the said Koontz his answer thereto within fifteen days thereafter, and that both parties be allowed sixty days next after the service of said answer to take testimony in support of their several allegations and denials, notice of intention to examine witnesses to be given to the opposite party at least five days before their examination, but neither party to give notice of taking testimony within less than five days between the close of taking it at one place and its commencement at another, but in all other respects in the manner prescribed in the act of February 19, 1851.

Mr. UPSON. On the 5th of December last, this House by resolution directed that "the certificates and all other papers relating to the election in the sixteenth congressional district of Pennsylvania, be referred to the Committee of Elections, when appointed, with instructions to report at as early a day as practicable which of the rival claimants to the vacant seat from that district has the prima facie right thereto, reserving to the other party the privilege of contesting the case upon the merits without prejudice from lapse of time or want of notice."

In pursuance of that direction the majority of the committee in this case have made their report. By an investigation of this resolution by the House, which will be found on page 73 of the report, and the accompanying exhibits, it will be seen that there is no person now occupying that seat, but that the seat is vacant. The reason or excuse for that will be found in an extract from the Governor's proclamation, which will be found on page 23 of this report, in which, after enumerating the various persons who have been elected from the various districts of Pennsylvania, the Governor says, in regard to the sixteenth district:

"And I do further declare that no such returns of the election in the sixteenth congressional district have been sent to the secretary of the Commonwealth as would, under the act of Assembly of 2d July, A. D. 1839, authorize me to proclaim the name of any person as having been returned as duly elected a member of the House of Representatives of the United States for that district."

The Clerk of this House consequently had the name of no person as Representative-elect from that district to enter upon the roll of Representatives at the opening of this session. And as no person is occupying the seat, of course no person could appear regularly as a contestant for it. And by the direction given to the Committee of Elections by the resolution of the House, they were instructed to ascertain and declare who had the prima facie right to the seat, so that the other party claiming the seat, if there were another, might be allowed to come forward and contest it.

The committee having examined the subject, have reported in favor of Alexander H. Coffroth as having the prima facie right to the seat. The reasons therefor are stated in the report of the majority of the committee. But I will briefly go over those reasons, and refer to some of the papers upon which the conclusion of the committee is founded.

The Governor's proclamation, as it will be seen, would be the first evidence of the right to the seat. But by examining an extract from the laws of Pennsylvania, which is found on page 23 of the report, paragraph forty-two, it will be found that after the returns from the various districts have been made to the secretary of the Commonwealth—

"It shall be the duty of the Governor, on the receipt of the returns of the election of members of the House of Representatives of the United States, as aforesaid, by the secretary of the Commonwealth, to declare, by proclamation, the names of the persons so returned as elected in the respective districts; and he shall also, as soon as conveniently may be thereafter, transmit the returns so made to the House of Representatives of the United States."

In pursuance of that law, which I notice has been perhaps inadvertently omitted in this connection by the minority of the committee in their report, the secretary of the Commonwealth not only transmits the proclamation of the Governor, but also the returns that have been made to him from that district, to the Clerk of this House, so as to be before the House.

Mr. PAINE. I understand the gentleman to say that the minority of the committee have omitted to refer to that law in their report.

Mr. UPSON. No, sir; I said that the minority of the committee had perhaps inadvertently omitted to refer to it in this connection.

Mr. PAINE. I beg pardon of the gentleman; it is especially referred to in their report.

Mr. UPSON. I shall be thankful to the gentleman to make any correction of what I may accidentally or incidentally omit to state; but the gentleman will find that he has said in that report that there is no authentication whatever of these returns. That is why I incidentally alluded to it. I hope the gentleman will not understand me as wishing to misstate the point I referred to. I was merely alluding to this to show how the returns from this district, of the majority of the board or of the entire board, came before this House. I consider it unnecessary even to make that reference, from the fact that as the authentication in all instances is only for the purpose of identification or of ascertaining the genuineness of the paper, and as both the parties in this case admit the identity of the paper or return, there need be no further authentication; and its legal effect is to be determined from the paper itself. The Governor's proclamation, then, not making out a prima facie case, we come next to the return made by the district judges of that district, the sixteenth congressional district of Pennsylvania.

Here, perhaps, it is proper that I should state in brief the manner in which the elections are conducted in the State of Pennsylvania, so far as regards certifying the returns. At the elections in the various election precincts in that State, there are one judge of election and two inspectors, and two clerks appointed by the judge and inspectors. When the canvass has been made in each election precinct and certified, the judge of the election takes the certificate to the board of judges of the county, so that the judges from these several election precincts meet after the election at the time specified by law, compare the returns, and add them up, making the county canvass. When an election district for member of Congress is composed of more counties than one, then one of the judges designated by the county board is selected to take the returns for that county to the board of district judges for that representative district, which board in this case met at Chambersburg, in the county of Franklin. This district is composed of five counties, Fulton, Adams, Somerset, Bedford, and Franklin; so that, in a full board, there would be five district judges.

But, on examining the papers, it will be seen that there are apparently two returns of district judges; it appears on the face of the papers that there were two boards and two different returns, one in favor of Mr. Koontz and the other in favor of Mr. Coffroth. The committee, therefore, were met in the first instance by this apparent ambiguity, and it was necessary in the first place to determine which was the genuine return, who were the genuine judges.

But before proceeding to this investigation in relation to the judges, I will refer to the rule laid down by the Committee of Elections in the last Congress in relation to cases of this kind, in which the prima facie right is to be determined. In the case of William Jayne vs. J. B. S. Todd, the Committee of Elections laid down the following rule, which I read from page 2 of volume one of the Reports of Committees of the first session of the last Congress:

"In considering the preliminary question, which of these gentlemen is entitled to occupy the seat as Delegate from Dakota, pending the settlement of the main question, which of them was duly elected thereto, the committee have refrained altogether from any investigation of the merits of the latter, and confined themselves entirely to the credentials each has offered as the prima facie evidence of his election, entitling him, according to law and usage, to be received as the sitting Delegate until investigation of the number of legal votes actually cast shall disclose a better right of another thereto."

In that very case of Jayne vs. Todd, each party had a certificate making it in that respect similar to the one now under consideration. The committee, therefore, considering that rule adopted by a former House as pertinent and proper in this case, applied themselves to an examination of the papers which were referred to them, in order to determine the prima facie right. When these two district returns were presented, the committee were led in the first place to inquire which was the genuine return. By these returns it appeared that there were two claimants to the seat, one Mr. Coffroth, the other Mr. Koontz. Both these gentlemen appeared before the committee, and submitted arguments in support of their respective claims. Each claimant produced the opinion of the attorney general of Pennsylvania, upon this very same question, which was submitted to the Governor of Pennsylvania before he issued his proclamation. The opinion of the attorney general will be found on page 69 of the report. Each of the claimants admitted that this opinion should be regarded as evidence so far as concerns the statement of facts it gives in relation to the genuineness of the two papers before the committee.

In the opinion of the attorney general of Pennsylvania, to be found on page 71 of the report, I find the following statement of his conclusion after having recited the facts:

"The result is that of the five persons who have signed the papers stating Mr. Koontz to be elected, three had no legal authority to act in the capacity which they assumed, and I am therefore of opinion that the Governor ought not to base his proclamation on that paper as a return."

In other words, he decided that the facts show the paper purporting to be a certificate in behalf of Mr. Koontz was not a legal and valid paper because the persons signing it were not legal and valid judges and had no right to sign it, and the paper was therefore illegal and worthless.

Now hear what he states in regard to the other paper. He says that—"It is signed by four persons who appear to have been legally designated by the judges of election in their respective counties."

But he claims their action was illegal for this reason. He says that—

"The judge from Somerset, though he had notice, neglected or refused to attend the meeting, or at any rate failed to attend it. The duty of the four judges who did attend is clearly pointed out by law. It was to 'cast up these several county returns and make duplicate returns of all the votes given' for the office in the district, 'and of the name of the person elected.' Instead of doing this, they omitted to count the vote of Somerset, apparently by reason of the non-attendance of the judge from that county. It has been suggested that as they had not those returns they could not count them, which is very true. But duplicate originals were accessible in the office of the prothonotary of Somerset county, and it was their duty, if necessary, to refer to them. They could not, of course, have obtained them on the same day; but though the law fixes the day of their meeting, it was perfectly legal for them to adjourn, if the business could not be completed in one day, and I think it was undoubtedly their duty to do so."

Although he holds that they were a legal board and legally met on the day and at the place fixed by law for determining the result of the election, yet, omitting to count the vote of Somerset county, their return, he says, is not sufficient upon which to base the proclamation of the Governor of Pennsylvania declaring that Mr. Coffroth was elected.

I will now refer to that return, to be found on page 26, commencing at the bottom of the page. It is as follows:

Election return of the sixteenth congressional district of Pennsylvania, composed of the counties of Adams, Bedford, Franklin, Fulton, and Somerset.

The undersigned, a majority of the return judges elected by the several boards of the return judges of the above-named counties to meet, examine said returns, and count the votes of the several counties in said district, do hereby certify that, in pursuance of law, we met in the court-house in the borough of Chambersburg, on Friday, the 4th day of November, A. D. 1864, and proceeded to examine and count the votes cast for Congress in said district at a general election held in the said counties on the second Tuesday of October, it being the 11th day of the month; that Alexander H. Coffroth had, in the county of Adams, 2,707; in the county of Bedford, 2,504; in the county of Franklin, 3,457; in the county of Fulton, 807; making a total of 9,475.

For the same office William H. Koontz had votes in the county of Adams, 2,366; in the county of Bedford, 2,033; in the county of Franklin, 3,508; in the county of Fulton, 535; making a total of 8,402; majority for Coffroth, 1,073.

Hon. Alexander H. Coffroth, having received a majority of all the votes cast, as counted before the board, is declared duly and legally elected "a member of the House of Representatives of the United States," and a certificate of election has accordingly been forwarded to him.

Now comes the point in which the difficulty is claimed to arise by the attorney general of Pennsylvania:

The county of Somerset was not represented by a judge, or otherwise, at said meeting. Notice of the time and place of meeting of said board was given the return judge elected from Somerset, who was in the borough of Chambersburg on the day of meeting.

In testimony whereof we have hereunto set our hands and seals this 4th day of November, A. D. 1864.

[L. S.] W. FINDLAY MANN,
Judge from Bedford county.

[L. S.] JOHN H. LAKER,
Judge from Franklin county.

[L. S.] NATHAN WINTER,
Judge from Fulton county.

[L. S.] F. DIETZ, Return Judge.

Attest: JOHN R. ORR, Clerk.

Now let me read further what the attorney general says on that point:

"The act of 1839 provides that the judges shall make returns of 'all the votes given for such office in said district, and of the name of the person or persons elected,' and further provides that it shall be the duty of the Governor, on the receipt of the returns of the election, as aforesaid, 'to declare by proclamation the names of the persons so returned as elected in the respective districts'; that is to say, returned as elected in a return which also purports to return all the votes given for the office in the district."

"The paper in question does not purport to return all the votes given for the office in the district. It shows on its face that the vote of one county in the district was not counted, and therefore that the judges had not before them the means of knowing who was elected; and, indeed, the return substantially is, that Mr. Coffroth had a majority 'of all the votes cast as counted before the board,' (that is to say, of the votes in four out of five counties which composed the district,) and therefore is duly elected. This return is so essentially defective that I conceive it to be no return at all, and am of opinion that the Governor ought not to base his proclamation on it as a return."

It was on that opinion or conclusion thus given by the attorney general that the Governor of Pennsylvania acted when he came to the conclusion that he ought not to include any person in his proclamation as elected from that district.

I wish now to refer to the position taken by the committee in the report, and to show that the opinion of the attorney general on this point is not supported by the statute nor the decisions of the courts of that State.

"But it is claimed on the part of Mr. Koontz that the said return shows on its face that the county of Somerset was not included by the said return judges in the count, and, therefore, that return is void, though it also appears in the return, and also in the opinion of the attorney general, above referred to, that the return judge of Somerset county was present at Chambersburg on the day of the meeting, and was notified thereof, but neglected or refused to attend.

"The attorney general, in his said opinion, also takes this position, and claims that the district judges ought to have adjourned over, and referred to duplicate originals of the returns for Somerset county, which he says were accessible in the office of the prothonotary of said county of Somerset.

"To this it may be replied, that the statute makes no provision for any such adjournment or proceeding, and it does not appear by the said statute that, in case where a congressional district is composed of several counties, any such duplicate original is required to be filed in each of the counties of the district, but the original statement of votes given in each county for Representative in Congress, certified by the judges and attested by the clerks, is directed (section 63) to be taken charge of by one of said judges, who 'shall produce the same at a meeting of one judge from each county at such place in said district as is or may be appointed by law for that purpose;' and when the district return judges have met and cast up said returns, and made duplicate returns of all the votes given for such office in such district, it is then, and not till then, required (section 64) that one of said duplicate returns so made by said district return judges shall be filed in the office of the prothonotary of the court of common pleas of the county in which they shall meet."

I would say, as has already been stated in the report, that there is no provision in the statute of Pennsylvania authorizing the board to adjourn from day to day to obtain election returns after the time fixed by law for the board to meet and act, and that, in a matter of this kind, arising under a similar provision in a soldiers' voting law, previous to the present law, in a case decided in 4 Philadelphia Reports, the court adjudicated this point, and decided directly the reverse of the opinion of the attorney general. I refer to the case of Lawrence vs. Knight, 4 Philadelphia Reports, 355, in which the duty of return judges in regard to soldiers' votes is explained, and also some directions given to the prothonotary by Judge Ludlow. On page 861, he says:

"Having thus indicated what, in my opinion, is the simple duty of the prothonotary, it is necessary for me to say what is the duty of the return judges; and this advice is now given so that hereafter the court may not be applied to for that purpose. These gentlemen must meet and perform their duties on November 12, 1861, being the second Tuesday in November. They ought not to adjourn to another day.

"My opinion upon that question has, on an examination of the subject, undergone a change; at first it was presumed the body might adjourn to another day; but this cannot be the law, for if this right be admitted, they may adjourn for a period of six months or a year, and thus defeat the expressed will of the people.

"The duties of these gentlemen are simply, under the present law, ministerial; they can only inquire if the certified copies of company returns alone before them have been delivered to them by the prothonotary of the common pleas. I might at length state my reasons for this opinion, but it may be unnecessary."

On examination of the statute of Pennsylvania, which is now similar in its language so far as regards the proceedings of the board in relation to this matter of adjournment, I think there can be but little doubt that the construction given here by Judge Ludlow to the statute is correct, and that to allow any other construction would lead to very great irregularities, and be subject to the objections stated by that judge.

This decision was predicated, as I have just said, on the previous soldiers' voting law. The phraseology of the present law in relation to the action of the board is very similar, and the construction in relation to the powers and duties of the board and as to adjournments it seems to me must be the same; although in one respect there seems to be this qualification: the present law is more strict in its requirements as to poll-books, tally-lists, oaths and certificates than the old law. And these papers, I insist, are a part of the returns, as I think I shall be able to show before I conclude this argument.

We then come to this conclusion, following out the decision of the court in Philadelphia, upon the principle involved in this case:

1. The opinion of the attorney general upon the facts conclusively shows that the board of return judges, or what purported to be such, and certified in favor of Mr. Koontz, was not a legal board, and therefore all its acts are void and of no effect in this investigation.

I think there was no difference in the committee on this point, that there was no legal board certifying to Mr. Koontz's election.

2. The facts admitted and stated in the attorney general's opinion show that the persons signing the Koontz returns were not return judges, and therefore they are illegal. If we should come down to common parlance we should call them bogus returns.

We find the attorney general sustaining the legality, on the facts which are admitted, of the other board, so far as their appointment is concerned, being regularly appointed judges for that district from the several counties, and only lacking one judge from Somerset county.

It is claimed by some that it required all to sign. In relation to that I will also quote the opinion of the attorney general, on page 70 of the report:

"It is well established that (unless otherwise expressly provided) an authority of a public nature, conferred on three or more persons jointly, may be executed by a majority at a meeting lawfully held, and of which all have had legal notice, and that the meeting and proceedings of such a body are presumed to be regular in the absence of proof to the contrary. But a minority of such a body cannot, by withdrawing (for whatever reason) from the majority and proceeding to act independently, vest in themselves the authority which the law has conferred on the whole, and permits to be exercised by a majority as above stated."

Having then found that they constituted a majority of the legal board, and having, in addition to that, found, from the face of the return itself, that the other judge from Somerset was notified and refused or neglected to attend, I submit that the action of that one judge cannot nullify or destroy the action of the majority; that when they acted, they did all the law authorized them to do, and all that they could do under the law. To say that the one judge could, by his own voluntary absence, nullify the action of the others, would certainly be rather a singular exhibition of the one-man power; it reverses the principle that the majority shall rule; and although injustice may sometimes be done where a majority is reckless, I submit to the gentleman raising this objection that far greater injustice would be done by allowing a minority to override the will of the majority and prevent all action. In such a case we must have sufficient confidence in the action of the majority not to allow them to be overridden by the action of one man, for whatever reason. And in this case it is seen that this judge had full notice and declined to attend. And if we go on still further, and go beyond, not behind the return of this board, to the return of Somerset county, which was not included in that district return, we shall find that the vote of the county of Somerset, if brought in and added to the district return, would not change the result.

I refer the House to the third page of the report, where they will find the vote, as so returned, of all the counties, Adams, Bedford, Franklin, Fulton, and Somerset. In Somerset the official return was—for Coffroth 1,592, for Koontz 2,512; if you add that to the other returns, it gives for Coffroth 11,067, for Koontz 10,974; leaving Coffroth a majority of 93 on the face of the official returns from all the counties of the district.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman if in obtaining that result the soldiers' votes are not entirely thrown out.

Mr. UPSON. Nothing appears on the face of the returns to show that, but they are not entirely thrown out; there are soldiers' votes here. If I may be permitted to go on now and anticipate the course of my argument, I think I can show that there are soldiers' votes counted in these returns from every county.

Mr. SCOFIELD. What I mean to ask is whether, if the soldiers' votes had been counted, the majority would not have been in favor of Mr. Koontz? By excluding a large portion of the soldiers' vote they make 93 majority for Coffroth.

Mr. UPSON. I will notice that when I come to investigate that question, but at present that question does not arise; when it does, I think I can satisfy the gentleman that no number of soldiers' votes that could legally have been counted would have altered the result.

We have shown that the vote of Somerset county was not in, and the reason why it was not in. We then show that the vote of Somerset county would not have changed the result, and therefore that there is no excuse for going behind the legal returns.

But suppose we waive that for the time being and resort to what comes next in order under the law of Pennsylvania, namely, the official returns of the county boards, and what do these show? I may say here in relation to these returns from the county boards, that those from the three counties of Franklin, Fulton and Somerset are admitted by both parties to be signed by all the return judges, and to be genuine returns. No question is raised about them. Then from Adams and Bedford counties there are what are called majority and minority returns, and those were both submitted and referred to the committee.

And here I wish to allude to a point which my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] noticed in the opening of my argument. In the minority report the objection is made that the majority returns are admitted only in connection with the minority returns. The one is admitted and the other is admitted. I do not question anything in relation to that point, they are both admitted for the purpose of investigation.

But the question at once comes up in regard to their legality and effect. The identity of the papers is admitted by both parties, undisputed by either of them. When we consider the majority and minority returns the question comes up, which is the legal paper? We will see by reference to the opinion of the attorney general that the majority return is the legal return, and the minority return has no legal effect whatever. That opinion of the attorney general is quoted in the report of the majority of the committee on page 5 of their report. There was a judicial district embraced within this congressional district, which district was composed of the counties of Franklin, Bedford, Somerset, and Fulton. I will here read from the report of the majority of the Committee of Elections, as follows:

"But it is claimed on the part of Mr. Koontz that all the return judges in each county must sign and certify the returns of that county; that the judges must act as a unit, and that if they do not so unite in signing the certificate, the certificate is void and the return invalid. A similar position was taken by a Democratic district board of return judges of the counties of Franklin, Fulton, Bedford, and Somerset, composing the sixteenth judicial district of Pennsylvania, in regard to a return of soldiers' votes for judge, certified by the majority of the county return judges of Bedford, the same as in this case, (paper 9,) and said district return judges assumed to reject the return of soldiers' votes for judge, so certified by the majority of the return judges of Bedford county, because said return was not signed by the remaining nine return judges of said county, and in this way overcame the majority for King, the Union candidate for judge, and gave the certificate to Kimmell, the Democratic candidate, but included in their return a statement of this soldiers' vote, and the fact of their action in regard to it."

And the Governor referred the matter to the attorney general of the Commonwealth, because if these votes were rejected one man was elected, if they were counted another man was elected as judge.

Mr. PAINE. I would not interrupt the gentleman, as his time is passing away, but I desire to ask him a question. My question is this:

whether it is not true that in the case of the judicial election, of which he is now speaking, it does not appear from the papers which he cites that any of the judges who did not sign the majority report were present? The language of the law of Pennsylvania is that the report shall be signed by all the judges present; and from the papers in the case of the judicial election it does not appear that the judges who did not sign the report were present.

Mr. UPSON. In either case the law is the same. I have not here all the papers referred to; but I think that in that case there was a majority and a minority report, the same as in the other case. I know that the majority and the minority of the board disagreed; and it was on that very point, because they disagreed and did not sign the report, the district judges made the point that it should not be received and counted, and they threw out the votes, thereby electing the Democratic candidate. The Governor laid the matter before the attorney general, who says, in his opinion:

"The district return judges of the sixteenth judicial district, composed of the counties of Franklin, Bedford, Somerset, and Fulton, have transmitted to the secretary of the Commonwealth a return, in which they state that they have not included the Bedford county return of soldiers' votes, a copy of which they annex, and they assign as the reason for not including it that said return was not certified to by nine of the return judges of Bedford county. The return in question is signed by thirteen of the county return judges, forming therefore a majority of the whole number.

"The reason assigned for not including this return is palpably insufficient. As the authority of the return judges concerns matters of a public nature, a majority may act at a meeting lawfully assembled, and their meeting is presumed to be lawful in the absence of proof to the contrary. The clause of the seventy-ninth section of the act of 1839, providing that the returns shall be signed by all the judges present, does not govern the present case; and if it did, it would, first, be construed as directory merely, and second, it would be presumed that the return was signed by all the judges present in the absence of proof to the contrary."

Therefore, in either case it would be immaterial whether the judges who did not sign the report were present or absent, so far as the reasoning of the attorney general is concerned.

I now call the attention of the House to these returns, which will be found as follows: for Franklin county, on page 27 of the report; for Somerset county, on page 28; for Fulton county, on page 29; for Bedford county, on page 30; and of Adams, on page 32.

The returns from the counties of Franklin, Fulton, and Somerset are signed by all the judges. The return of the home vote of Bedford county is signed by all the judges. The return of the soldiers' vote of Bedford county and the return of the vote of Adams county, including the soldiers' vote, are signed by a majority only of the return judges. Now, when we compare these majority returns with the minority returns, and when we find that it has been decided by the courts of Pennsylvania, and by the attorney general of that State, that under the law of that State a majority of the judges may act, it at once does away with the whole action of the minority, because, as has been well said, the minority cannot represent the board, and they have no legal power to act separately and independently of the majority.

The identity or genuineness of these papers is not questioned; and the returns of these votes from Adams, Bedford, Fulton, Franklin, and Somerset counties, will be found summed up on page 4 of the report, giving 11,067 for Mr. Coffroth, and 10,979 for Mr. Koontz; leaving Mr. Coffroth's majority on the face of these county returns at 88, so that he still has the prima facie right to the seat. Now, I submit to this House, in considering a claim of this kind to a prima facie right to the seat, what authority have we to go beyond the official returns of those who were the proper officers for computing and certifying the returns of votes cast in that district? We consider that our duty is ended on this investigation of a prima facie right when we have compared these official returns and counted the number of votes given for the respective candidates, and find that on the face of them Mr. Coffroth has a majority of all the votes so certified.

In this prima facie case we are simply to inquire, whom does the certificate of the proper officers show to have received the greatest number of votes? An investigation on the merits must be had on evidence; and when that investigation is had, then the question as to whether any legal votes have been rejected or any illegal votes counted is a fit subject for examination. Until the time arrives for determining the contest on its merits, we cannot, I submit, go behind the returns of the proper certifying officers.

But, in addition to this, it will be seen that by the law of Pennsylvania, when the board of return judges for the congressional district have cast up and computed the votes and certified them to the secretary of the Commonwealth, it is also made the duty of those return judges in every case to transmit to each of the persons elected to serve in Congress a certificate of his election within five days after making up such returns. Such a certificate is presented here by Mr. Coffroth. That certificate, which will be found on page 87 of the report, is in these words:

We, the undersigned, return judges, elected by the board of return judges of the counties composing the sixteenth congressional district of Pennsylvania, viz: Adams, Bedford, Franklin, Fulton, and Somerset, to examine the returns and count the votes cast for member of the House of Representatives of the United States, cast in the counties for said office at a general election held on the second Tuesday of October, it being the 11th day of the month, having met in the court-house in the borough of Chambersburg, on the 4th day of November, and having examined the returns and counted the votes cast in said district, do hereby certify that you, having received a majority of the votes cast as counted by us, are duly and legally elected member of the House of Representatives of the United States.

In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands and seals this 4th day of November, A. D. 1894.

[L. S.]	W. FINDLAY MANN, Judge of Bedford county.
[L. S.]	F. DIEHL, Judge of Adams county.
[L. S.]	JOHN H. LAKE, Judge from Franklin.
[L. S.]	NATHAN WINTER, Judge from Fulton.
	JOHN R. ORR, Clerk.

Attest:
Hon. A. H. COFFROTH,
Somerset, Pennsylvania.

The return judges who sign this are the same who signed the aforesaid district return sent to the secretary of the Commonwealth and laid before the Governor.

The other return judges—so-called return judges, for the attorney general of Pennsylvania decided that they were not legally return judges—gave a certificate to Mr. Koontz, but that certificate falls from the fact that the persons signing it had no legal authority, and therefore their acts are of no validity. The certificate which Mr. Coffroth presents stands, therefore, uncontroverted by any other official paper from any board authorized to act in the premises.

The prima facie right, therefore, of Mr. Coffroth appears first from the certificate given by the majority of the district judges, who are competent to act in the premises, and who acted, so far as appears here, in good faith. It does not appear in any way that the district board did anything to prevent the attendance of the other district judge. On the contrary, the papers show that they notified him to appear, and that he neglected to appear on notice. His purpose, it would seem, was to defeat the action of that board and prevent a certificate from being given. The action of the majority should be considered as sufficient. They did what they were authorized and required to do by law; they counted all the votes returned to them.

I will here say that I do not know how it is in other States; but I know that in my own State the State canvassers only canvass the votes returned to them at the time the canvass is made. It happens at times that counties may not make returns on account of the distance or other difficulties in respect to the transmission of returns; yet the board are required by law to act between certain days, and the result is determined without counting the returns which may come in afterward. I have been credibly informed that this is also the practice in the State of Pennsylvania. How true this may be those who come from Pennsylvania may know best. We are told when an election is had and it becomes well known who is elected, that sometimes the return judge of some county in the district, knowing that the return from his county will not change the result, neglects to attend the meeting of the board and allows the remainder of the district board to add up the returns and declare who is elected. It is known that it is unnecessary to include their return, as it would not affect the ultimate result.

But it is claimed we still have a right to go behind these returns. Why? Because it is said that two of these returns are signed by only a majority of the board, and that all must sign the return or it is invalid. I have endeavored to answer that objection, and to show that the attorney general of Pennsylvania, in a case arising out of this very election, has decided directly the reverse. He evidently will not be accused of any partiality toward the minority in this House. If there were any partiality, it would be in favor of the majority of the House. We have seen what he has decided in relation to this matter, and that the Governor of Pennsylvania has acted upon it. He decided that it was legally sufficient if the return was certified by a majority of the board, and the commission was given by the Governor to the man who had the highest number of votes, counting the returns which were so signed and certified by a majority of the board.

Mr. DRIGGS. My colleague will let me interrupt him for a moment. I understand from his argument he settles these facts: that Mr. Coffroth has a majority of the votes certified to by a majority of the judges of election, that he has the certificate signed by the proper officers, and that a majority of the Committee of Elections has reported in his favor.

Mr. UPSON. These are the facts. He has the returns of the county boards and the return and certificate of the district board in his favor.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to know who has a majority of votes upon any certificate, because there is no legal certificate. If the committee take all the votes filed and in their possession, who has the majority?

Mr. UPSON. That depends upon many things.

Mr. STEVENS. Who has a majority of all the votes before the committee?

Mr. UPSON. If the gentleman wishes to know who has a majority of the legally returned votes, that is another thing.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not want to know about legal returns in a prima facie case. I want to know who has a majority of all the votes returned.

Mr. UPSON. I will read to the gentleman the decision of the court of Pennsylvania on that subject. So far as the returns can be considered on this investigation there is nothing outside of the certified returns.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman does not understand me.

Mr. UPSON. I say that a paper purporting to be a return with the names of no legal officers signed to it is no return.

Mr. STEVENS. Are certain votes attached to it?

Mr. UPSON. I do not know that there is any legal paper to show it.

Mr. STEVENS. That is a question on the contest.

Mr. UPSON. A prima facie case is what appears on the papers certified by proper officers. We are not investigating the case on its merit, and do not know what the result would be after hearing evidence on a contest.

Mr. PAINE. The gentleman has said, in reply to a question by his colleague from Michigan, [Mr. Driggs,] that Mr. Coffroth had the certificate of the lawful board, had a majority of the votes, and had a majority of the Committee of Elections. Now, I will begin with the committee. He had five out of the nine members constituting that committee. The names signed to the majority report are these: CHARLES URSON, H. L. DAWES, PORTUS BAX-TER, S. S. MARSHALL, WILLIAM RADFORD; and the names signed to the minority report are these: HALBERT E. PAINE, J. W. McCLURG, S. STELLABARGER, G. W. SCOFIELD.

If the gentleman says that he has shown that Mr. Coffroth had a majority of the votes it is merely a matter of opinion as to what he has done and what he has failed to do, and the House must wait until the other side has been heard.

If he says that the certificate for Mr. Coffroth is the certificate of the lawful board, that is what we deny. If he says the return of Mr. Coffroth came from the lawful board and his certificate entitles him to a seat, that is what the minority of the committee firmly and conscientiously believe to be incorrect.

Mr. UPSON. My colleague asked me what I claimed, and I replied that I claimed certain things. Of course I expect to hear the argument of the gentleman who represents the minority, and of course the House will listen to him with pleasure.

In my answer to the question propounded by my colleague, whether I claimed such a state of things as he suggested, I replied that I did. But I did not intend to preclude the gentleman from expressing a different view or say that I considered it as decided beyond a peradventure so that nobody could answer it otherwise. And I answered it as I thought it satisfactorily appeared to the minds of a majority of the committee.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would inquire if the gentleman considers he has answered the question of my colleague in this particular, and I am going to repeat pretty nearly the same question. If all the returns from the different precincts at home as well as from the boys that voted in the field, certified after some fashion or other as legal votes, and unquestioned as such before us—if all those votes were added up, would it not make a majority of some sixty or seventy for Mr. Koontz?

Mr. UPSON. I will answer that in the language of Justice Ludlow.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would rather have the language of my honest friend from Michigan than that of any judge, because he was there and helped to count those very votes that were referred to us in committee. And if my friend cannot tell us without the circumlocution of an authority, there is no book that can enlighten us on the subject. I ask, if by counting all these returns, you do not make a majority of sixty or seventy for Mr. Koontz? Whether they are legal and to be counted or not is another question.

Mr. UPSON. I counted the votes with the gentleman in committee, and made out, in counting by a standard which I consider legal, that Mr. Coffroth had a majority on the face of the papers.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I desire to have the gentleman to say whether, if we counted all the returns, Mr. Koontz would not have a majority, not according to legality, but according to arithmetic.

Mr. UPSON. I will take the very position assumed by the minority in their report in relation to the soldiers' votes, and will say that there are no returns here sufficient to give a majority to Mr. Koontz.

Mr. SCOFIELD. No legal returns.

Mr. UPSON. No returns. If the gentleman will investigate the papers he will find that there are no formal returns, no returns on which to make out a majority for Mr. Koontz.

Now, I call attention to the decision of the courts of Pennsylvania on this subject, and I refer to the case of Lawrence vs. Knight, 4 Philadelphia Reports, p. 366:

"The act of Assembly, enacting upon the prothonotary of the court the duty of certifying returns. He must send the returns to the return judges. That responsibility, we have over and over again said, rested upon him, and he must act simply as a ministerial officer, having no right to reject a return regular upon its face, and unless it is regular it is no return."

Mr. STEVENS. I do not care about the returns. If the votes are here that is prima facie evidence.

Mr. DAWES. Suppose they are brought in my pocket.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAINE. The gentleman has been interrupted a great deal; I move that this time be indefinitely extended.

No objection being made, the gentleman was allowed to proceed accordingly.

Mr. UPSON. I thank the House for this privilege. I will now proceed to the investigation of the matters which have been called out by the interrogatories propounded to me by various gentlemen on this floor.

I have referred to the decision made in the courts of Pennsylvania, supposing that my friends from Pennsylvania would certainly be willing to abide by the decision of their own court, and supposing also that the opinion of the attorney general, where it coincided with the views of the majority, would not be quarreled with, and that the rule adopted by this House in the previous contested-election case would be abided by. Now, if we are going to call everything that is on a piece of paper a vote, we may have any amount of such papers referred to a committee, and may elect anybody. But we are only to investigate papers that come from the proper certifying officers, that are legal on their face and are pertinent to the issue.

Now, let us refer to the law of Pennsylvania in relation to soldiers' votes, and then see what are called soldiers' votes in this case, for Heaven knows I desire to count every vote of every soldier. But in the investigation of the prima facie case, we are confined to papers that are prima facie regular, and where they are not regular and legal on their face we cannot give any weight to them in this investigation. When we find that the signature to a certain paper is not the signature of the officer that it purports to be, that moment that paper is out of the case; but the moment we determine that any paper on the same subject is certified by the proper officer, that moment it is a paper proper for our consideration, and is legal and valid.

A few words now in relation to the soldiers' vote. And here I wish to call the attention of the House to some decisions in relation to the very returns which it is claimed in the report are not properly before us in this investigation and could only be properly considered in an investigation of the merits. I refer now to the law of Pennsylvania allowing soldiers to vote. Section two provides that—

"A poll shall be opened in each company, composed in whole or in part of Pennsylvania soldiers, at the quarters of the captain or other officer thereof; and all electors belonging to such company, who shall be within one mile of such quarters on the day of election, and not prevented by orders of their commanders or proximity of the enemy, from returning to their company quarters, shall vote at such poll and at no other place."

Now, I wish the House to notice this one fact, the law expressly makes each company an election precinct, and this House would not hesitate in the case of a home vote where two election precincts came and voted in one place together to reject the vote. Now, it appears from the report that two companies of one regiment voted at one precinct and returned their vote as the vote of two companies, and no reason whatever is given for it; it is signed by officers purporting to be officers of both companies, and consequently was a merging of two election precincts into one without any legal authority whatever. The previous military voting law of Pennsylvania not only provided for company returns, but also provided for returns from those companies as election precincts to the headquarters of the regiment, and a regimental return to the secretary of the Commonwealth. In the case of Lawrence vs. Knight, the court, in giving instructions to the prothonotary under that law, in speaking of those regimental returns, says:

"In my judgment, you cannot certify a single regimental return; no provision whatever is made for so doing. If you should discover in any case that no company returns have been received, but only a regimental return it is not your fault. You have no more right to certify to the return judges than you have to send in to them a copy of any other paper on file in your office."

This shows that where there was a regimental return, but no company return, the regimental return could not be counted under the old law any more than two election precincts could vote in one precinct on the home vote. Two election precincts cannot vote together without nullifying the vote; and much less can two companies vote together, as the law expressly says that polls shall be opened in each company, and separate returns of the votes kept and returned for each company.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman read the whole of that section?

Mr. UPSON. I will read the whole of it if the gentleman desires it. He will find that where there are exceptional clauses, those exceptional clauses have to be put in the return, showing that they are within the exceptions, or the votes cannot be counted; and he will find returns in one or two instances showing that very thing. I will read the whole section:

"A poll shall be opened in each company, composed in whole or in part of Pennsylvania soldiers, at the quarters of the captain or other officer thereof; and all electors belonging to such company, who shall be within one mile of such quarters on the day of election, and not prevented by orders of their commanders or proximity of the enemy from returning to their company quarters, shall vote at such poll and at no other place. Officers, other than those of a company, and other voters detached and absent from their companies, or in any military or naval hospital, or in any vessel or navy-yard, may vote at such other polls as may be most convenient for them; and when there shall be ten or more voters at one place, who shall be unable to attend any company poll or their proper place of election as aforesaid, the electors present may open a poll at such place as they may select, and certify, in the poll-book, which shall be a record of the proceedings at said election, substantially in the manner and form as hereinafter directed."

Now, let us turn to what is called the return of the election, and I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to notice the position taken by him in relation to the law of Pennsylvania in relation to these votes.

The minority of the Committee of Elections in their report in this case, on page 14 of the same, lay down the rule that under the soldiers' voting law of Pennsylvania the military return is in substance the same as the return of home votes, and that the poll-book, tally-list, and certificates of oaths form no part of the return, and they assert that—

"The law requires the prothonotary to certify to the board copies of the returns, not of the poll-books or other papers."

And that—

"If the originals are used, it is only at the original returns that the judges are required to look."

If this position of the minority be correct, it follows conclusively that if there be no such return, nothing but the poll-book, tally-list, and certificates of oaths, then there is nothing for the prothonotary to certify to the board; and if he certifies this poll-book, tally-list, and certificates of oaths only, there is nothing for the board to correct, and no legal return, as the tally-list is a part of the poll-book. (See section 15.)

Mr. PAINE. In the minority report an alternative statement is made. It is shown that to adopt the rule which the minority of the committee are inclined to consider the true one, the result would be in favor of Mr. Koontz. Adopting the other rule, that you are to look not only to what are technically called the returns, but also to the tally-lists, poll-books, and the certificates accompanying them, under that rule also Mr. Koontz is entitled to his seat.

Mr. UPSON. I quote from page 14 of the report as made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE.] The gentleman claims, as I understand, the very position which I asserted, on pages 37 to 41 of the report of the committee, being the return for company H of the two hundred and eighth Pennsylvania regiment. Commencing with the poll-book of the election the House will find the form, which is substantially that put down in the law of Pennsylvania upon this subject, except the filling up.

But in relation to that I will show that the law requires, different from the requirement in reference to home elections, that the returns shall be made in the poll-book, and with the poll-book and tally-list shall also be returned to the prothonotary of the court, who is to certify them to the district judges. What is the law?

"Sec. 4. Before opening the poll on the day of election, the electors present at each of the places aforesaid shall elect, ex officio, three persons present at the time and having the qualifications of electors, for the judges of said election; and the judges so elected shall then appoint two of the persons present, who shall be qualified to act as clerks of said election; and the judges shall prepare boxes or other suitable receptacles for the ballots."

Now, what further?

"Sec. 5. Before any votes shall be received, said judges and clerks shall each take an oath or affirmation that he will perform the duties of judge or clerk (as the case may be) of said election, according to law and to the best of his abilities; and that he will endeavor to prevent fraud, deceit, or abuse, in conducting the same, which oath or affirmation any of the said judges or clerks, so elected or appointed, may administer to each other; and the same shall be in writing, or partly written and partly printed and signed by said judges and clerks, and certified to by the party administering the same and attached to or entered upon the poll-book, and there signed and certified as aforesaid."

These are the express provisions of the law made in this case, because those elections were to take place out of the State. And it was found under the former law, as I am credibly informed, which this law changed, where there were no poll-books and tally-lists required to be returned in this specific way, gross frauds had been perpetrated in Philadelphia, and in one case the sheriff elected by so-called soldiers' votes was afterward turned out on an investigation of the election, the returns being found to be forged or fraudulent. And I look upon this law as designed to prevent the perpetration of such frauds in elections.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether in the law to which he refers there is not a provision that no informalities in the holding of the elections by the soldiers in the camps shall be allowed to defeat their purpose; that their votes shall be counted and the returns received, notwithstanding any informality. If the gentleman admits that such is the fact, then, considering this strong provision of the Legislature, designed to protect the soldiers against the consequences of any errors which they, unaccustomed to such duties, might commit in reference to the formalities of the elections, I ask the gentleman this question: if he cannot, for the sake of securing the rights of our patriotic soldiers, consent to waive any informalities or errors which their returns may exhibit, why is he so extraordinarily liberal in waiving all the informalities of these return judges at home? The gentleman has been arguing for an hour to show that there were great informalities in the action of the return judges. Yet he is willing to waive all those informalities when they would operate against Mr. Coffroth, while he is not willing to waive some little informalities in the returns of the soldiers' vote, although the act of Assembly under which the soldiers in the field voted declares expressly that no informality shall invalidate their action.

Mr. UPSON. I have not been arguing on formalities. I have been stating what I consider to be the law as enunciated by the attorney general of Pennsylvania and by the courts of that State; and I maintain that admitting the fact that certain officers who were in the minority did not do their duty does not invalidate the action of the majority, and that the action of the latter is to be regarded as perfectly legal.

But, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] has not correctly cited the language of the law of that State in reference to the soldiers' vote. Its language is, "no mere informality," not "no informality." There is a vast difference between the phraseology of the act and the phraseology cited by the gentleman.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. There is not much difference between the two phrases.

Mr. PAINE. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the provision of the law of Pennsylvania, which I am about to read, does not apply to the election held in this case as well as to all other elections, whether held at home or in the field:

"It shall not be lawful for said judges or clerks, in casting up the votes which shall appear to have been given, as shown by the certificates under the seventy-sixth and seventy-seventh sections of this act, to omit or reject any part thereof, except where, in the opinion of said judges, such certificate is so defective as to prevent the same from being understood and computed in adding together the number of votes."

I wish also to ask the gentleman whether the law which applies only to elections in the field does not contain this provision:

"No mere informality in the manner of carrying out or executing any of the provisions of this act shall invalidate any election held under the same, or authorize the return thereof to be rejected or set aside."

Mr. UPSON. The first section which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] has quoted is a part of the general election law of Pennsylvania. The second is a provision of the soldiers' voting law. The question which the gentleman asks is substantially the same as that just propounded by my friend from Pennsylvania. If the gentlemen had allowed me to go on I should have reached the point which they suggest.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. UPSON. Certainly.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman has referred, I believe, to an instance in which two companies voted together, and the return is certified, I think he said, by the officers of the two companies. I desire to ask the gentleman whether, in that case the poll-books and tally-lists accompanying the return showed the respective companies to which the voters were returned as having belonged.

Mr. UPSON. The return is printed in the report; and I cannot answer the gentleman without referring to that document.

Mr. THAYER. The question is very material as regards the particular case which the gentleman puts. If the poll-books and tally-lists accompanying the return show that every man who voted belonged either to company B or company G, and also show to which of those companies each voter belonged, and if the commanding officers certify to that return, it seems to me to furnish so complete a guarantee against any possible fraud in the return that such a case would clearly come within the saving clause of the act of Assembly, which provides that no informality shall deprive the soldiers of their votes. It was with this view that I addressed my inquiry to the gentleman.

Mr. DAWES. Suppose this to have been just so; suppose this to have been as intimated by my friend from Pennsylvania, and it goes before the return judges, the liberal statute of Pennsylvania says that the return judges shall not reject any return for mere informality, if in their opinion, (I call his attention particularly to this,) if in their opinion it is so far formal that they can ascertain the facts, or something to that effect. Suppose the return judges were of the opinion that this return he has suggested was so far informal that they could not accept it, and suppose they made a mistake. I suppose if my friend and I had been those return judges we would have thought differently; but suppose these return judges thought it was so informal that they made a certificate without taking it in, what I want to ask is, whether when that certificate comes up and we are not asked to go back, but only to consider a prima facie case, we ought to go back of that certificate?

Mr. SCOTFIELD. There is no provision that in the opinion of these judges they shall invalidate any election—

Mr. DAWES. The law in another place expressly says what I have stated.

Mr. THAYER. I inquire for information in regard to the point made by the gentleman from Michigan on the theory that the House might be able, in consequence of the fact apparent on the returns so far held by both parties in this case, to go behind those original returns and inspect the papers in possession of the committee, which contain the original returns upon which the board acted.

Mr. UPSON. Perhaps the inquiry was proper enough at the time. If I had been permitted to go on I would have analyzed the whole law, and would have referred to all these points without any inquiry on the part of any gentleman. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit me, I will say that the law he first quoted has been in existence since 1839, and that under that law the decision was made to which I have referred in the Philadelphia Reports. I wish to call his attention to the fact that the prothonotary or the district judges have to determine the identity or genuineness of any paper before them.

Mr. PAINE. I wish to correct an evident misunderstanding of the law of Pennsylvania, not on the part of the gentleman, but on the part of others. The law allows soldiers from two hundred companies to vote at the same precinct. Indeed, the members of a thousand companies may vote at one precinct, provided they are not organized companies. What we say is, there is nothing on the face of the return to warrant, but everything to negative, the conclusion that these were two organized companies; and we assume it as clear that they were two detachments, and could vote at one place. Will the gentleman point out anything which contradicts it?

Mr. UPSON. The law provides there shall be a poll at each company.

Now, I have stated the general law to which the gentleman has alluded, and which since 1839 has existed in the State of Pennsylvania. I have referred to the decision of Judge Ludlow, which is to be found on page 360 of the Philadelphia Reports. I will read from Judge Ludlow's advice to the prothonotary and return judges. He says:

"Your office is simply ministerial. You are to open the papers received by you and examine them, to discover if they contain the company returns, and if a paper presents itself to your notice which you are satisfied is a palpable forgery, and therefore no return, it is not a paper of which you can take any notice; but if the paper is of doubtful authenticity, it may be a 'return,' and you are not to judge upon the validity of any such document."

But still further in relation to this election law. I was speaking about the necessity, as those elections took place outside of the State, of having these provisions in the law, and the reason why they were incorporated, namely, for the greater security of the soldier whose vote might otherwise be tampered with and forged returns made, as was the case in New York where the votes returned were differed from the votes put in the ballot-box. I hold that the returns should have been made up and certified as the law required. But how were they made up? The law says:

"Separate poll-books shall be kept, and separate returns made, for the voters of each city or county. The poll-books shall name the company and regiment, and the place, post, or hospital in which such election is held. The county and township, city, borough, ward, precinct, or election district of each voter shall be indorsed opposite his name on the poll-books. Each clerk shall keep one of said poll-books, so that there may be a double list of voters."

"At the close of the polls the number of voters shall be counted and set down at the foot of the list of voters, and certified and signed by the judges and attested by the clerks."

"As a check in counting, each clerk shall keep a tally-list for each county from which votes shall have been received, which tally-list shall constitute a part of the poll-book."

See how carefully they sought to protect the rights of soldiers so as not to allow him to be imposed upon by fraudulent returns.

Then again:

"After the examination of the tickets shall be completed, the number of votes for each person in the county poll-books as aforesaid shall be enumerated under the inspection of the judges, and set down as hereinafter provided in the form of the poll-book."

The following shall be substantially the form of the poll-books to be kept by the judges and clerks of election, filling in the blanks carefully."

The form of the poll-book is then given.

"A return in writing shall be made in each poll-book, setting forth in words, at length, the whole number of ballots cast for each officer, (except ballots rejected,) the name of each person voted for, and the number of votes given to each person, for each different office; which return shall be certified as correct, signed by the judges and attested by the clerks; such return shall be substantially as follows."

The form of return is then given.

Now, I wish to call the attention of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] to the tabular lists which he has made here of votes given, to show him that not only is his construction of the law as to the return incorrect, but the result is different from the conclusion he draws from the rule he has laid down himself. In regard to Mower hospital, Cuyler hospital, and McClellan hospital, none of them contain any return of votes. There is nothing but the poll-book and the tally-list; and if the gentleman says that those are no part of the returns, then there is nothing whatever to identify as returns. There is no return made out of any votes cast. There is not a single certified return outside of the poll-books and tally-lists in Mower, Cuyler, and McClellan hospitals. Nor is there any such return as to the election at Barracks No. 1, and if these are deducted from the tabular statements in the minority report, for want of these returns it overcomes the majority there claimed for Koontz, and gives it to Mr. Coffroth on the very rule laid down by the minority in their report.

In addition to that, at Barracks No. 1, it is certified to the poll-book in two places that there were only forty-eight persons voting, while the tally-list returned certifies to 78 votes cast for member of Congress, thus making the votes cast nearly double the number of voters in the poll-book for that county.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. UPSON. Certainly.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. They all voted, as they had a right to do, for member of Congress, and they were certified to have so voted; and in making the returns they returned the names to the proper county, properly certified—the entire aggregate vote for Congress to a single county. Now, I ask, is that a reason why their votes should be disregarded?

Mr. UPSON. I think my friend is mistaken. We have the returns which were made to the prothonotary of the county of Bedford and to the secretary of the Commonwealth, and in those returns we have the following certificate:

"It is hereby certified by us that the above list of electors voting at the said election is correct, and that the number of electors of Bedford county, State of Pennsylvania, voting at the said election, amounts to forty-eight."

Then it says, still further:

"Tally-paper or list of votes for each person voted for at the said election by the qualified voters of Bedford county, State of Pennsylvania, for Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States, sixteenth district:

"For Congress, William H. Koontz had 58 votes; A. H. Coffroth had 29 votes."

So that it gives some 89 votes above the amount certified.

And to show that I am not mistaken in this, I will give here the certificate given by the secretary of the Commonwealth:

PENNSYLVANIA, ss:

I do hereby certify that the foregoing is a correct copy of said election return so far as the same relates to the county of Bedford.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand, [L. s.] and caused the seal of said office to be affixed, this 26th day of October, A. D. 1864.

W. H. ARMSTRONG,

Deputy Secretary of the Commonwealth.

And to show still further that this has been carefully prepared, I give you the certificate added to that of Mr. Shannon, the prothonotary of Bedford county, showing that he received from the secretary of the Commonwealth this very paper, and which is in these words:

BEDFORD COUNTY, ss:

I, O. E. Shannon, prothonotary of said county, certify that the foregoing is a full and true copy of a poll-book, (except printed form in blank,) or copy of poll-book, received in my office from the secretary of the Commonwealth.

In witness my hand and official seal at Bedford, [L. s.] the 27th day of January, A. D. 1865.

O. E. SHANNON, Prothonotary.

Now, there is the certified vote by the secretary of the Commonwealth, and on page 43 it is certified in the same way by the clerks of election to the prothonotary of Bedford county:

"It is hereby certified by us that the above list of electors voting at the said election is correct, and that the number of electors voting at the said election amounts to forty-six."

The only difference is that in the one case 46 votes are returned, and in the other 48 votes. By the return certified to the prothonotary of Fulton county, there was no vote given for member of Congress; and I ask the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] how he can presume that a vote was given where none is certified?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I will answer my colleague on the committee when my turn comes.

Mr. UPSON. I did not expect an answer now. I merely called the gentleman's attention to it.

But still further. I was alluding to these returns in another aspect. We have been told that it is our business, in determining a prima facie case, to go into the merits and count all these votes.

I wish now to call attention to another section, to show that there are objections which may be made to these returns:

"Sec. 22. All said elections shall be subject to contest, in the same manner as is now provided by law; and in all cases of contested elections, all legal returns—"

Making a distinction between returns and legal returns—

"which shall have been bona fide forwarded by said judges, in the manner hereinbefore prescribed, shall be counted and estimated, although the same may not have arrived or been received by the proper officers to be counted and estimated in the manner hereinbefore directed before issuing the certificates of election to the persons appearing to have a majority of the votes then received, and the said returns shall be subject to all such objections as other returns are liable to, when received in due time."

I wish gentlemen to mark that returns that are not received in time, the law says, shall be subject to all such objections as other returns are liable to, and that when received in due time they are open to objections. Those objections I will now endeavor briefly to point out. I will not quote the section so often referred to by gentlemen containing the words "on mere informality," because I do not think it necessary now, and besides that, I do not see that it alters the course of reasoning in the least. I will now speak of the objections apparent on the face of the so-called returns, which, in my judgment, unless they are authenticated by evidence showing that the votes actually were cast, would not entitle them on the face of the papers to be received, but which it is possible may be helped by extraneous evidence showing that the election was held and proper proceedings taken to authorize the soldiers to vote. I read from page 7 of the report:

"One of these so-called returns for Bedford county of an election claimed to have been held at Barracks No. 1, Soldiers' Rest, Washington, District of Columbia, shows on the poll-book the names of only forty-eight electors as voting, which list is certified by the clerks and judges as correct; and yet the same clerks and judges of election return an aggregate of 87 votes as cast for Representative in Congress, or 38 more votes than electors voting, which is manifestly an absurd and illegal return, and should not and could not have been counted by the county return judges. The return also gives no company or regiment (section 7) to which the soldiers belong, nor states any facts or circumstances to bring them within any of the special provisions of section two of the act, which could authorize them to open a poll or hold an election there."

I may add, also, that it was not certified to the county board, as appears from the papers referred to the committee, and therefore it could not be counted if it had been before them.

"So also the poll-book in the other so-called return for Bedford county, purporting to be for company H, two hundred and eighth regiment, (paper 19) shows only thirty-six electors from Bedford county, while the return gives 56 votes for Representative in Congress. If it be claimed that the poll-book shows the names of electors from other counties, it is a conclusive reply that the law (section 7) expressly says that 'separate poll-books shall be kept, and separate returns made, for the voters of each city or county'; and we see no authority given to the return judges of Bedford county to count votes cast for other counties, and especially when, as in the case of this last return, some of the electors reside in counties not within the congressional district."

And this return was also not certified to the county board, and could not be counted by them.

"Of the eight alleged as rejected returns for Adams county, the three from the hospitals, namely, Mower, Cuyler, and McClellan, are by all the committee admitted to be too defectively certified and authenticated to be entitled to any consideration. The law in relation to the certifying, signing, and returning with the poll-book the evidence of the administering the oath to the officers of the election, was wholly disregarded. So also in the case of company C, two hundred and second regiment, where only one judge of election appears to have been appointed, or sworn, or acted, the committee were alike unanimous in their opinion that the return was invalid, the law expressly requiring three."

And I find the minority agree with me in their report, and on page 15 they admit that this return is invalid, although it is counted in their second tabular statement given on page 18 of their report.

"The returns of company I, two hundred and tenth regiment, (paper 35,) do not show that two of the judges or the clerks were sworn, a certificate of which the law (sections 5 and 15) expressly requires. The returns for companies B and G, one hundred and thirty-eighth regiment, (paper 39,) show that these two companies voted together at one poll and having the same election officers, both judges and clerks."

"* * * * *
"The returns for company B, twenty-first Pennsylvania cavalry, either show the judges and clerks of election to have been sworn before one James Mickle, who was not an officer of the election and had no authority (section 5) to administer such oath, or else that neither of the judges or clerks of election were sworn, and in either case is in violation of the law."

Mr. THAYER. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he considers that return invalidated by the fact that the two companies of the one hundred and thirty-eighth regiment voted at the same poll, provided that there are accompanying papers to show that every man who voted had a right to vote. And I will ask the gentleman, whether, if there were representatives from half a dozen companies, he considers it would be necessary to have a separate return for every man who happened to be there from a different company.

Mr. UPSON. Where they voted under the exceptional clause of the law that would be so stated in the return; and I will answer the gentleman by propounding another question. Suppose that the voters from two different wards or election precincts in the city of Philadelphia should vote in one election precinct, would the gentleman call that legal? I wish he would answer it, yes or no.

Mr. THAYER. I answer that that would clearly be illegal. But I conceive that there is a great distinction between an election held at home and an election held by soldiers in the field. The two cases are not at all analogous; and it is because they are not analogous that the Legislature put in that clause, which protected their rights from being destroyed by want of compliance with immaterial formalities.

Mr. UPSON. The analogy is perfect; each company is equivalent to an election precinct, and is made so by the express language of the statute.

And now, in relation to this matter about judges of election, where it appears that there was only one judge appointed, and where there is no certificate of officers sworn, I refer to page 282, Bartlett's Contested Elections, in the case of Howard vs. Cooper, of Michigan. The report of the committee in that case was sustained by the House. The committee in that case say:

"Your committee have rejected the vote of the township of Van Buren. The law requires that the board of inspectors shall be constituted of three persons in number. The proof is clear that there were but two, and as there was no board of inspectors known to the law, your committee see no way by which any legal effect can be given to the returned vote. They have, therefore, deducted it, although it can in no way affect the decision of this case, whether it be deducted or retained."

And I refer to page 314, Contested Elections, in the case of Blair vs. Barrett, in relation to the fact where it is expressly required that the officers of election shall be sworn, &c.

"The committee are aware that it is sometimes held that public officers are presumed to be qualified, and to have taken such oaths of office as the law requires, and must be taken and deemed to have done so in the absence of proof to the contrary; but in this case the law of Missouri expressly required that a 'certificate of their qualification shall be returned with the return of the votes.' It was expressly charged, as a ground of contest, that they had not been sworn. It would have been a matter of the greatest case to have proved the fact, if it had been a fact, by summoning any one of those officers as a witness; yet the sitting member, though he called many other witnesses to other points, at no time examined either of the fifteen men officiating at those precincts, or any other person, as to this fact."

Now, it should be borne in mind here that the law of Pennsylvania expressly requires that this oath should be administered, that it should be signed, that it should be certified by the person administering it, and the certificate appended. It is necessary that it should appear on the face of the return that this party has been sworn and has assumed the obligations of an election officer.

Now, on page 315 the committee further say:

"In the case of Joseph Draper vs. Charles C. Johnston, in the Twenty-Second Congress, (Contested-Election Cases, p. 701.) the Committee of Elections state the law, as your committee believe correctly, as follows:

"The neglect by the sheriff or other officer conducting the election to take the oath required by law vitiates the poll for the particular precinct or county, and the whole votes of such precinct or county are to be rejected. The legal presumption is that the oath required has been taken, every officer being presumed to have done his duty, and that the onus is thrown upon the party taking the objection to show the neglect or omission; but as the law of Virginia requires that the oath shall be duly returned by the magistrate before whom it is taken, and filed in the clerk's office, a certificate from the clerk that no such oath is filed will be sufficient prima facie (notice of the objections being previously served upon the opposite party) to throw the burden of proof upon the party claiming the vote."

"In this case the law of Missouri requires that the certificate of the qualification of the judges of election shall be returned with the return of the votes. An inspection of the record shows no such return at the precincts now under consideration."

This is exactly the case before us. Here are a number of returns, on the face of which there is not the least evidence that this oath was administered, unless you draw such an inference from the recitals in the headings given in the forms in regard to other matters but not intended for that part of the law relating to the certifying and authenticating the oath. In some cases there is no evidence whatever of the administering of the oath to any officer whatever.

The report continues:

"It was distinctly alleged, as a ground of contest, that these judges had not taken the oath, and the committee had come to the conclusion that the burden was upon the sitting member, claiming these votes, to show that these officers had actually taken the required oath, or to have shown affirmatively that the votes he asked to have counted for him at these precincts, if the officers were not qualified, were actually given by bona fide voters; and he, not having shown either the qualification of the officers or the fairness of the vote, but the contrary appearing, the votes at these precincts, namely, Gravois coal mines, G. Sappington's house, and Harlem House, are rejected."

Now, sir, in a case as to the prima facie right, are we to apply a different rule from that which was applied by this House in the case to which I have just referred, in which case the committee cite various other decisions to the same effect?

I will now call the attention of the House to page 18 of the report, where the minority of the committee present a tabular summing up of the votes, giving a majority to Mr. Koontz. I shall endeavor to point out where, as I consider, the return is plainly defective. The first summing up by the minority gives Mr. Koontz a majority of 32, while the second gives him a majority of only 14. Now, sir, when, by their own rule, you deduct from the first summing up the votes credited from Mower hospital, McClellan hospital, and Cuyler hospital, in reference to which there is no evidence of any oath having been taken, and no return outside of the poll-book and tally-list, and when you deduct also, by the same rule, the votes credited to Barracks No. 1, where there is no return appended, the entire majority is destroyed.

Taking the second summing up, making the same deductions, and also deducting the vote credited to company C, two hundred and second regiment, which in the minority report, page 15, is admitted to be void, (there being but one judge of election,) but which is here counted, the result is a large majority for Mr. Coffroth.

But, in addition to that, these other objections I have noticed in passing lie to every single return except one, that one being, I believe, the return of company K, one hundred and eighty-fourth regiment.

Hence, I consider that even if we should go behind the certificate of the return judges, which I hold we are not authorized to do in a prima facie case, still there are not, on the face of the returns, enough votes that can be counted in favor of Mr. Koontz to authorize a different conclusion from that to which the majority of the committee have arrived, that Mr. Coffroth has a majority of the votes cast, on the face of the papers, and the prima facie right to the seat in question.

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the resolutions submitted by the majority of the committee, by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That William H. Koontz has the prima facie right to a seat in this House, as a Representative of the sixteenth congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania.

2. Resolved, That Alexander H. Coffroth, desiring to contest the right of William H. Koontz to a seat as Representative of the sixteenth congressional district, be required to serve upon the said Koontz, within fifteen days after the adoption of this resolution, a particular statement of the grounds of said contest; and that the said Koontz be required to serve upon the said Coffroth his answer thereto within fifteen days thereafter; and that both parties be allowed sixty days, next after the service of said answer, to take testimony in support of their several allegations and denials; notices of proposed examinations of witnesses to be given at least five days before such examinations; no such examination to be commenced at one place before the expiration of five days from the conclusion of the last examination at another place; such examinations to be regulated in all other respects by the provisions of the act of February 19, 1851.

Mr. Speaker, during the course of this debate the attention of this House has been called, by an interrogatory addressed to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] by his colleague [Mr. DRIGGS] to the fact that the report of the majority of the Committee of Elections in this case is in favor of Mr. Coffroth. While such is the fact, I feel it incumbent upon me to say that, in my view, the particular circumstances of this case entitle it to be considered by the House as an exception to the general rule which induces the House to follow the report of the committee. In a case of this kind, where the committee are so nearly divided, it seems to be the duty of the House to consider with more than usual care the reasons which ought to influence them in making up their verdict. Now, while it is true that five out of nine of the committee believe that Mr. Coffroth is entitled to the seat, it is equally true that four out of the nine have, after the most patient and laborious investigation, come to the conclusion that Mr. Koontz is entitled to the seat. On their behalf, as well as on behalf of what I believe to be the cause of truth itself, I ask the House to give this case more than their usual consideration. God knows I do not desire that the contestant in whose favor the minority has reported should have his seat here if the law and the facts of the case do not entitle him to it; but it is my duty as it is the duty of each one of the minority to show what these facts and legal principles are, and to ask the House to act upon them carefully and deliberately.

Mr. Speaker, I have to say, at the outset, that there is before this House, in this case, not one single legal instrument of evidence, not one single item of evidence upon which either party could act without the consent of the other, except the proclamation of the Governor of Pennsylvania, and possibly the soldiers' returns. No, sir, not one single item of proof, legal in its character, except the proclamation of the Governor of Pennsylvania, and, perhaps, the returns of the soldiers' votes.

All the lawyers in this House, of course, are familiar with the statute of the United States which provides for the authentication of the records of the several States; and most of them who are not lawyers are familiar with that law. I will, therefore, not refer to its provisions; but I will call the attention of this House to the statutory provisions of the State of Pennsylvania respecting the authentication of such instruments as have been used before this committee. On page 425 of Purdon's Digest of the laws of that State appears the following:

"Whenever provision has been or shall hereafter be made by law for recording in the proper office any paper, or papers, the record and records thereof made, and exemplifications of the same lawfully certified, shall be legal evidence in all cases in which the same would be competent testimony."

On page 379 it is provided, as follows:

"It shall also be the duty of the prothonotary of every county to record all the election returns in a book to be procured for that purpose, and to lay the returns of the election of county commissioners, and county auditors, and of all township officers, before the court of quarter sessions of such county."

"It shall also be the duty of every prothonotary to give a certified copy of the list of voters and other papers deposited in his office by the judges of an election to any person applying for the same, on payment of the usual fees as in other cases."

I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that in deciding upon the competency of evidence offered before this committee or this House, we should be at liberty to follow either the law of the United States or the law of the State of Pennsylvania. The proclamation of the Governor of Pennsylvania manifestly complies with the law of the United States, because it comes before this House with the great seal of that State and the attestation of the secretary of that Commonwealth. But the district board returns which are presented here, as well those in favor of Mr. Coffroth as those in favor of Mr. Koontz, do not come before this House or this committee properly authenticated, either under the law of the United States or the law of the State of Pennsylvania. They bear the seal of no prothonotary. They bear the seal of no officer. It is true, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] has said, they are transmitted by the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania to this House. But it so happens that they do not come authenticated or accredited by any certificate or statement or credential of the Governor of the State. They come accompanied by his proclamation, in which he declares to us that he finds them both to be nullities as returns. If you go beyond them to look at the returns of the county boards, which come next, passing down from the Governor's proclamation toward the ballot-box, you find they cannot, by any possibility, have any official character as evidence before this committee or this House. They cannot by any possibility come before us as evidence unless they come by the admission of the parties, because, as the gentleman from Michigan has claimed before this House, there is no provision under the law of Pennsylvania or any other law for depositing these county board returns in any depository known to the law of Pennsylvania or any other law.

There is no authority to be found in the statute of Pennsylvania for depositing these returns in the office of the prothonotary of the county or of the secretary of the Commonwealth, or in any other office, in a case like this where a congressional district is composed of two or more counties. If there were but one county in the congressional district, then the case would be different, then a copy would be deposited in the office of the prothonotary and another sent to the secretary of the Commonwealth. But in this case the law makes no provision for a depository of the county court; therefore, it can come from no official depository hither. No official depository can send or bring such county board returns to this House. No officer of Pennsylvania is authorized to certify such returns.

It is true that in a regular contest before this House, where it is proper to take depositions, these returns might be brought as part and parcel of the depositions offered to this House, and it is true that they could be used as they have been in this case before the committee by the consent of the parties. But if they are received by the consent of the parties it must be with the conditions accompanying that consent. They must be received with the conditions which the parties see fit respectively to impose.

But the case is different with the returns of military elections. There are depositories for them. They are placed in the office of the prothonotary of the county, and they are sent to the office of the secretary of the Commonwealth, and hence they can be certified and can come before us as they have come before us as evidence of undoubted competency independent of the admissions of parties.

Mr. UPSON. I would like to inquire whether there is any question raised as to the identity of any of the papers submitted by either party.

Mr. PAINE. I will answer the gentleman as I proceed in the case. There is no dispute as to the Governor's proclamation; there is no dispute that the return of the Coffroth district board was prepared by the men who appear to have signed it and presented to the Governor; there is no dispute that the return of the Koontz district board was prepared and sent or presented to the Governor by those who appear to have signed it; there is no dispute that the county board returns of Franklin, Fulton, and Somerset, were signed by all the judges whose names appear to be attached thereto, or that they are all proper and correct returns. But when we came to the county board returns of Adams and Bedford counties, it was insisted on the one hand that the papers which were signed by the alleged majorities of the judges of those two boards were lawful and correct returns, and on the other hand that the returns made by the alleged minorities of these two boards actually included the whole legal soldiers' vote, and were therefore better than the two majority returns of Adams and Bedford counties, which did not include these soldiers' returns which should have been included, and were therefore utterly and absolutely void.

Mr. UPSON. The gentleman does not answer my question. It is as to the identity and genuineness of the papers.

Mr. PAINE. I have answered it. It was admitted on all sides that these papers were signed by those whose names purported to be attached to them. But their official character was disputed, and the main object of this investigation was to determine the legality of those returns.

Mr. STEVENS. Having the several returns with the certified number of votes, what authority have we, on the prima facie case, to inquire into the legality of these votes?

Mr. PAINE. That brings me to the next question which I was about to consider. There were presented to the Governor as a basis of his proclamation under the law of Pennsylvania, and there has been presented to this House, as the basis for a prima facie claim on the part of each of these parties, two papers which purport to be district board returns for that congressional district, of which, to speak more strictly, one purports to be such a return and the other to be a return for four of the five counties of the district. One of these shows that Mr. Koontz received a majority of all the votes cast in that district, and was therefore legally elected. The other shows that Mr. Coffroth received a majority of the votes cast in four counties of that district, and is therefore declared to be elected.

Mr. Speaker. I will show that this return in favor of Mr. Coffroth is on its face a nullity. I will show that the return of Mr. Koontz is upon its face absolutely perfect. I will also show before I conclude that of the four men who signed the district board return in favor of Mr. Coffroth, only two had the shadow of a right to sit in that board, the opinion of the attorney general of the State of Pennsylvania and the majority of the committee to the contrary notwithstanding. I shall show that of those two who had the shadow of a right to sit in that board, neither had a right that can be admitted without the gravest doubt by this House.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask my friend from Wisconsin a question, to enable me to form my own judgment. On page 2 of the report of the committee I find a paragraph in these words:

"Aided by the light thus thrown upon the case, the committee were unanimously of opinion that the persons signing the said return in favor of Mr. Koontz were not the legally constituted board of return judges for said district, and had no lawful authority to make any such return, and that the four persons signing the said return in favor of Mr. Coffroth were a majority of the legal return judges, and the only lawful board."

Now, I want to know if the gentleman controverts that passage in the report? My vote will turn very much on this fact.

Mr. PAINE. When the gentleman speaks of "that passage in the report," I take it he does not mean a passage in the views of the minority.

Mr. SPALDING. I want to know if you dispute that paragraph.

Mr. PAINE. The statement the gentleman has read is found in the majority report. In reply, I will read a passage from the minority report, which is found about the middle of page 17 of the printed reports.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman answer my question? Does he controvert the paragraph I have read?

Mr. PAINE. Of course we controvert it; of course we deny it. The committee were not only not unanimous in that opinion, but every one of the four members who signed the minority report disputes it. I will read the answer we have made; referring to Adams and Bedford counties, we say:

"Neither these returns nor the judges who bore them had any place in either of the district boards."

And again, on page 19:

"Looking behind the return of the district board, we find, as the attorney general did, that the district judges of Adams and Bedford counties were selected by majorities of their respective county boards; and we also find, what the attorney general had no occasion to inquire into, that the returns borne by those judges were nullities, and that therefore neither the returns nor their bearers had any place in the board."

Mr. DAWES. I would like to ask my friend from Wisconsin a question.

Mr. PAINE. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to ask him if he holds that the board which signed what is called the Koontz return was a legal board.

Mr. PAINE. I hold that it was an illegal board.

Mr. DAWES. Then I would ask my friend if that was not also the opinion of his associates who signed the minority report.

Mr. PAINE. Perhaps I did not quite understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. DAWES. I ask my friend if he is of the opinion now that the board that signed what is called the Koontz return was a legal board.

Mr. PAINE. I am not; I am of the opinion that it was an illegal one.

Mr. DAWES. Was that the opinion of his associates of the minority?

Mr. PAINE. It was.

Mr. DAWES. Then I think the report of the committee is true when they say that the committee were unanimously of the opinion that it was an illegal board. I think my friend from Wisconsin must have misunderstood the question of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.] I understand him now to admit, speaking for the four minority members of the committee, that the Koontz board was an illegal board as it was constituted there. That certainly was the opinion of the majority of the committee, and if it was the opinion of the minority also, that makes it as nearly a unanimous opinion as well might be.

Mr. PAINE. I am sorry the gentleman from Massachusetts did not listen more carefully to the paragraph the gentleman from Ohio read. It contains two statements. The first is that the committee were unanimously of the opinion that the Koontz board was illegal; and the second is that they were unanimous in the opinion that the Coffroth board was legal.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which he had been directed to ask the concurrence of the House, namely:

Senate bill (No. 33) in relation to the Court of Claims;

Senate bill (No. 56) granting a pension to Mary C. Hamilton;

Senate bill (No. 82) granting a pension to Sarah Fitzgibbon;

Senate bill (No. 116) to extend the benefit of the pension law to artificers; and Senate bill (No. 112) for the relief of the heirs of James Bawdin.

ORDER OF PROCEEDING TO-MORROW.

Mr. STEVENS. I will take this occasion to interrupt the business under consideration for a moment to submit a motion which I think should be decided now. Several gentlemen, I understand, desire to make speeches upon the general subject of the President's message. I would suggest that the House now agree to meet to-morrow for debate only on the President's message.

Mr. PLANTS. Meet at ten o'clock.

Mr. STEVENS. Some members say meet at ten o'clock. Those who desire to speak ought to govern that.

The SPEAKER. The first part of the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] in reference to restricting the session of to-morrow to debate only, can be decided by the vote of the majority. The second part, in relation to meeting at ten o'clock, will require unanimous consent.

The question was taken upon devoting to-morrow to debate only upon the President's message; and it was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move that the House meet to-morrow at ten o'clock a. m., as some gentlemen who desire to speak seem willing to run the risk of having an audience at that time.

Mr. BROOKS. On behalf of the reporters of the Globe, whom we are working almost to death, I must object to that proposition. I want them to have a little rest.

Mr. STEVENS. Oh! if the gentleman makes it a question of humanity, [laughter,] I will withdraw the motion.

PENNSYLVANIA CONTESTED ELECTION—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to make a remark to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE.] As I understand from this discussion, the question of the legality of these boards is now in question. By the law of Pennsylvania the election judges, not the board, make out the returns and send them to the boards. The boards under our law have no authority to judge of anything in regard to the votes, either their legality or anything else; they have only to add them up.

Now, I would ask, why are we discussing this question of the legality of these returns by the board, if the returns made by these election judges are here in any shape so that we can act upon them?

Mr. DAWES. If my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] had listened patiently to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. UPSON,] and the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE,] he would understand why they are doing it.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to get at the marrow of the thing, without so much bone.

Mr. DAWES. It is this: it is because the majority of the committee believe that one part is illegal, and the minority of the committee believe the other part is illegal.

Mr. STEVENS. Does it make a particle of difference whether they are legal or illegal? If we have the vote sent up here, what difference does it make?

Mr. PAINE. I will come to that question directly. I say that of these two district board returns, the one in favor of Mr. Coffroth was upon its face an absolute nullity. And I ask the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who desires to understand this case, to what I now have to say. The district board return in favor of Mr. Coffroth was upon its face an absolute nullity as a return. That is the opinion of the attorney general, who gave that advice to the Governor when the Governor consulted him as to its validity as the basis of his proclamation.

On the other hand, the district board return in favor of Mr. Koontz is upon its face absolutely perfect. The Coffroth return is a nullity, because it purports to be the return of only four counties of that district, and not of all the counties. It shows upon its face that the vote of Somerset county was excluded. It does not purport upon its face to be the legal return of that district. On the other hand, if you look at the Koontz return you will find that on its face it does purport to be the return of all the votes of all the counties of the district, and that it is signed by five judges, by a full board of district judges. Now, these two reports were placed in the hands of the Governor; and the question is, why did he not, on the strength of the Koontz return, give Mr. Koontz a certificate? He himself pronounced the Coffroth return a nullity. Why, then, with that return in one hand, a nullity as he declares it to have been, and with the Koontz return in the other hand, perfect on its face, and signed by five judges, why did not the Governor give the certificate of election to the man who, upon the face of the papers, was entitled to it?

Mr. Speaker, if it be true, as the gentleman claims, and as I am willing to admit, that we are to take the papers on their face, I maintain that, beyond the possibility of controversy, Mr. Koontz was entitled to a certificate from the Governor, because his return was perfect, was signed by five judges, and was not impeached by any return which, as a return, had any validity. On the contrary, the only paper which attacked it was a paper which the Governor himself tells you was, as a return, a nullity. Why, then, did he, out of regard for that nullity, refrain from making his proclamation as he ought to have made it, in favor of Mr. Koontz? After it has been declared, in the opinion of the attorney general, that that return was a nullity, the Governor turns round and inquires into the legality of those two boards. What right had he to do that? Mr. Speaker, if he had a right to do that, we have the same right. But I believe that the Governor of Pennsylvania, looking only at the face of those papers, ought to have made his proclamation in favor of Mr. Koontz.

But it was represented to the Governor that the men who signed these papers were not all lawfully chosen judges; and he went into an examination—an examination nowhere provided for in the laws of Pennsylvania or the laws of the United States—in which he took testimony for the purpose of determining who were and who were not lawful members of these respective boards. By the consent of the parties he took the testimony of witnesses, and he found that the four men who composed the Coffroth board were lawfully chosen to that board. He found that only two of the Koontz board were lawfully chosen members of that board.

We have also examined all the evidence lawfully before us bearing upon these questions, and we find that only two of the Coffroth board had any shadow of a right to be members of that board. There were four judges who signed the Coffroth district board return. The judge from Franklin county, Mr. Winter, went first to the Koontz district board and signed the Koontz district board return on the same day on which he signed the Coffroth district board return.

Now, Mr. Speaker, whether he had any right to appear in that second board or not, whether he had any right to sign the return in favor of Mr. Coffroth or not, depends on whether the first board which he attended was or was not a lawful board. If it was a lawful board, then, when he had attended it and deposited his county return there, he was functus officio, and he had no right to attend the Coffroth board.

The member who represented the county of Fulton in the Coffroth board was Mr. Laker. I will read from the attorney general's opinion the agreed statement of facts, to show how Mr. Laker was chosen a member:

"Mr. Wilhelm, of Franklin, was selected as district return judge by the return judges of that county at their first meeting, and, of course, before the soldiers' vote had been counted. Mr. Laker, of the same county, was selected by the return judges of the county at their last meeting, and after the soldiers' vote had been counted. At that meeting, upon the suggestion of one of the clerks, Mr. Wilhelm, who was president of the board, stated that he had been informed that the selection of a district return judge, before all the votes had been counted, was illegal, upon which a motion was made and carried to proceed to a selection. The vote was taken and Mr. Laker had a majority, and the returns were accordingly placed in his charge. Mr. Wilhelm was nominated, but had not a majority. He never resigned the appointment which had already been made, but, no doubt, under the impression that such appointment was illegal, he put the question on proceeding to a new selection, announced the result, and as president signed a certificate, under seal, of Mr. Laker's selection as district return judge.

"I can see no ground for the assumption that a judge cannot be designated for these purposes just as lawfully before the certificate has been made out and signed as afterward; and therefore I conceive that the selection of Mr. Wilhelm was entirely legal. But that selection did not constitute him the holder of an office. He was rather a committee of one to perform certain duties. But, whether he be styled an officer or a committee, in my opinion the subsequent selection of Mr. Laker, and the actual placing of the certificate in his charge, completely discharged Mr. Wilhelm and overrode his appointment."

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is to be observed that Mr. Wilhelm was chosen unanimously by the board at its first meeting, when that board had a right to choose the man to take the return to the district board. Mr. Laker was chosen at the second meeting of the board, not unanimously, but by a majority, in the face of the opposition of the minority, after it had been discovered that it would be necessary to manipulate the soldiers' returns in the district board, in order satisfactorily to decide this case. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that I have found it very difficult, indeed, to recognize this selection of Mr. Laker by a bare majority against the opposition of a minority as overriding the unanimous selection of the board made under those circumstances. Nevertheless the minority of the committee have decided, not without grave doubts, to recognize Mr. Laker as a legal member of the Coffroth board. If, then, he had a right to be there, and being present made the board legally complete as to numbers, and if Mr. Wilhelm had no lawful place in the Koontz board, then Mr. Winter, from Franklin county, had also a right to be a member of the Coffroth board.

Now I come to the question whether the two judges who represented Adams and Bedford counties in that Coffroth board were lawful judges. In my judgment, the county judge, who takes the county board returns to the district board, has no place in that district board, unless he has with him the returns for his county. Those returns are his credentials. Without them he has no right to be there, because the only provision of the law of Pennsylvania, respecting the selection of the men who shall carry these county returns to the district board, is a provision that these returns shall be taken in charge by one of the county judges, and by him presented to the district board.

There is no statutory provision there for the election of one of the county judges to act as district judge. Of course the county board has a right to designate, otherwise every member of the county board might claim to be the district judge. Only a valid return, then, can constitute the credentials of the judge who bears the county board return to the district board. I say the judge who represented Adams county did not have with him lawful credentials. He did not bear with him to the district board a valid return. Why? The return was invalid for the same reason for which the Coffroth district board return was declared by the attorney general to be a nullity. It did not embrace all the soldiers' returns for Adams county. It rejected certain soldiers' votes which ought to have been included, as I will now proceed to show.

I come now to determine this proposition:

If it was the intention of the Legislature of Pennsylvania to augment the difficulties which must always attend the exercise of the elective franchise by soldiers in the field, by hampering them with more stringent and minute formalities than incumbent the elective franchise within the State, the intention was certainly not well expressed in the military election act of 1864, which contains the following sweeping clause, not found in any other general law of that State:

"No mere informality in the manner of carrying out or executing any of the provisions of this act shall invalidate any election held under the same, or authorize the return thereof to be rejected or set aside."

By the law applicable to the home elections

a clear distinction is made between the return of the precinct judges, strictly so called, and the poll-book, tally-list, and certificates of oaths. One duplicate of the poll-book, tally-list, and certificates of oaths is scaled up in one or more of the ballot-boxes and deposited with the nearest justice, "to answer the call of any persons or tribunal authorized to try the merits of such election." The other duplicate is sent under seal to the office of the prothonotary of the county. But an entirely different disposition is made of the return. That, and that only, goes to the county board. To that only do the judges of the county board look to ascertain the vote of the precinct. The errors, defects, and informalities of the poll-books, tally-lists, and certificates of oaths are immaterial. If the returns are not so defective as to be unintelligible, the judges must count them, and leave to other tribunals the rectification of whatever wrongs may ensue. The county board must meet on the first Friday after the election, and may meet on the morning of that day. But the law does not compel the deposit of the poll-books, tally-lists, and certificates before the evening of that day. Hence, during the whole of the day on which the board meets they may be inaccessible, even though the judges should desire to inspect them.

In the military elections the same distinction exists between the return and the poll-book, tally-list, and certificate. The military return is in substance the same as the home return. It is true that the military return is sent to the office of the prothonotary, where also the tickets, poll-book, tally-list, and certificates of oaths are sent, all being written in the same book or series of papers. But the reason of this is to be found in the obvious propriety of sending the return to some known public office to await the call of the county board. And no office can be more appropriate than that of the prothonotary. This circumstance, therefore, does not affect the legal character of the return. The law requires the prothonotary to certify to the board copies of the returns, not of the poll-books or other papers. If the originals are used, it is only at the original returns that the judges are required to look.

But all of the ten rejected returns of Adams and Bedford counties, (using the word in its restricted and proper sense,) except those of company B, twenty-first regiment, Adams county, and company H, two hundred and eighth regiment, Bedford county, are free from such defects as would render them unintelligible or incapable of computation; those of companies B and G, one hundred and thirty-eighth regiment, and company I, two hundred and tenth regiment, are absolutely perfect; and those of the three hospitals and of Barracks No. 1 closely approximate to perfection.

Now, the home electors have no such sweeping provision in aid of informalities as has been enacted for the soldiers. If, then, the county board cannot inquire into the regularity of the poll-books, tally-lists, or certificates of oaths of home electors who come with returns which are not so defective as to be unintelligible or incapable of computation, why should they inquire into the regularity of these papers when soldiers come with intelligible returns?

If, notwithstanding the evident intention of the Legislature to lighten the burden of formalities, always so oppressive to electors in the field, and to intrust to courts and other tribunals the remedy of inevitable evils, we are to scrutinize the soldier's poll-books, tally-lists, and certificates of oaths, as well as his returns, while the home elector is merely required to bring intelligible returns, still the soldier will bear even this scrutiny in the present case. For such a scrutiny shows the illegality of the rejection of eight of these returns.

1. The return of company K, one hundred and eighty-fourth regiment, was rejected "because it embraced one voter from Franklin county."

For want of proper proof that this vote was not counted also in Franklin county, which is within this congressional district, Mr. Koontz, who insists on his return, should lose one vote and the residue should be counted: for Mr. Coffroth, 21; and for Mr. Koontz, 38.

2. The returns of company C, two hundred and second regiment, was rejected for the alleged reason that the election was held and the return made by only one judge.

All three of the judges signed this return, which is not only intelligible, but almost perfect in form. And yet the accompanying poll-book and certificates do not show that more than one judge was sworn. We have therefore concluded, not without grave doubts, to reject this return, which would, if received, give Mr. Coffroth 15 and Mr. Koontz 27 votes.

3. The three returns for the Mower, Cuyler, and McClellan hospitals were rejected because the certificates of the oaths of the election officers were wanting. This was no lawful ground for their rejection, for it appears from the whole papers that the judges and clerks were actually sworn, and the returns, though defective in form, are perfectly intelligible, and clearly within the provisions of the statute applicable to mere informalities. They give Mr. Koontz 5 votes, Mr. Coffroth none.

4. The return of companies B and G, one hundred and thirty-eighth regiment, was rejected because two companies voted at one poll, before one set of election officers.

It does not, however, appear from the return, or from any other proof before the committee, that two companies voted at one poll or before one set of election officers. It does appear that electors of two companies so voted. But under the act of 1864 electors of two hundred companies may so vote. In order to invalidate this return, it must be shown that these thirty-three voters constituted two organized companies, and not detachments absent from their companies. This does not appear. On the contrary, the language of the return and of the poll-book is precisely such as would be proper if they voted as detachments. There could be no excuse for such rigor toward electors in the military service as would be involved in the rejection of this return, even if the liberal statutory provisions respecting defects and informalities were entirely wanting. This return gives Mr. Coffroth 1 and Mr. Koontz 32 votes.

5. The return of company I, two hundred and tenth regiment, was rejected because the certificates of the oaths of the election officers were wanting.

The poll-book recites that these officers were sworn. Their oath is annexed to the poll-book, duly signed by all the officers. The clerk's certificate is there. The return is substantially correct and duly signed. These papers clearly show that the election officers were duly sworn, and, in our judgment, are undoubtedly on the safe side of the line which separates essential defects from mere informalities.

6. The return of company B, twenty-first regiment cavalry, was rejected for three alleged reasons:

(1.) No copy of the return was certified by the prothonotary to the return judges.

It has already been shown that the judges might use the original which they had as well as a copy. And if there could possibly be any doubt as to their right to do that, there can be no doubt as to our right to use the certified copy which is before us.

(2.) It is alleged that the election of officers appears to have been affirmed by Captain James Mickle, who was not an officer of the election.

This, however, does not appear from the return, or from any of the papers connected with it, or from any other proofs before the committee.

(3.) The number of votes cast for Representative is alleged to have been greater than the number of Adams county electors present.

The poll-book does show that 2 votes were cast by electors of Franklin county, which is in the same congressional district. There being no proof that these 2 votes were not also counted in Franklin, they should be deducted from the vote of Mr. Koontz, and the rest counted—for Mr. Coffroth 4, and for Mr. Koontz 34.

The majority return from the Adams county board, then, was invalid for the same reason for which the return of the Coffroth district board was invalid. It did not embrace all the valid military precinct returns. It was claimed that it was also invalid because it was not signed by all the precinct judges present at the meeting of the board; that while it might not have been invalidated by the mere absence of a minority, yet the non-concurrence, and à fortiori the actual opposition of the minority being present, did destroy its validity. The considerations in favor of this position are not without weight. The phraseology of the law is peculiar and peremptory. "The clerks shall thereupon, in the presence of the judges, make out returns in the manner hereinafter directed, which shall be signed by all the judges present, and attested by said clerks." And if it would be a hardship to suffer a minority, by its opposition, to destroy a return, and so temporarily deprive a duly elected member of his seat, it would certainly be no less a hardship to suffer a majority, by a false return, to give the seat, despite the protest of the minority, to a claimant who was not in fact elected. Indeed, the injury in the former case would not be so great as in the latter. In the former case the rightful claimant would be subjected to a temporary delay in assuming his office, and the country to a temporary loss of his services; whereas, in the latter, an intruder, with no rights, would be thrust by individuals into the national Legislature at its organization, to remain until evicted after a contest. The right of a district to be always represented is nowise vindicated, but rather assailed, by the admission of an interloper to its place on this floor. The hazard of empowering a dishonest minority of county return judges to temporarily deprive a rightful claimant of his seat, and the country of his services, is as nothing compared with the hazard of empowering a dishonest majority to send hither men not chosen by the people to legislate for the country until driven from the House. It is true that this power must always reside somewhere, in Governors or other officers, authorized to furnish credentials to representatives in Congress. But only urgent reasons would warrant the extension of this power from responsible public officers to private individuals. If it were necessary to decide this question, we should find great difficulty in upholding the return of the majority against the objection that the minority opposed it.

The unlawful rejection, Mr. Speaker, of these soldiers' returns rendered the return of the Adams county board a nullity, and the man who bore that return to the district board had no legal character as judge in that board. For precisely the same reasons the return of the soldiers' vote, by the majority of the Bedford county board, was a nullity.

Neither this return nor the judge who bore it had any place in the Coffroth district board.

From the copy of military returns certified to the Bedford county board by the prothonotary, it appears that the returns rejected by the majority were those of company II, two hundred and eighth regiment, and Barracks No. 1, Washington, that the board had actual notice of the presence of the originals, in the prothonotary's office, and of his reasons for refusing to certify them.

The return of company II, two hundred and eighth regiment, was rejected for the alleged reason that the poll-book gives the names of only thirty-six Bedford county electors, while 52 votes are returned for members of Congress. This is true. But 16 votes are shown, by the poll-book, to have been cast by electors of Franklin and Fulton counties, of the same congressional district. They were sent to one county, instead of being distributed. Inasmuch as it has not been shown before the committee that these 16 votes were not also counted in the proper counties, they should be deducted from the vote of Mr. Koontz, who insists upon the return, and the rest counted—for Mr. Coffroth 18, and for Mr. Koontz 18.

The return of Barracks No. 1 was rejected for the alleged reason that the poll-book contains the names of only forty-eight electors, and yet 87 votes were cast for Representative in Congress. Passing from the return, which exhibits no such discrepancy, and is very far from being so defective as to be unintelligible, to the poll-books, which present the apparent contradiction, we find in the proofs before us a satisfactory explanation. By the law the election officers are required to keep at each of the polls as many poll-books as there are counties represented by electors. At the polls for Barracks No. 1 there were two for the sixteenth congressional district, which were produced before the committee. There may have been others. Of these two, one was the return in question, and the other was for Fulton county. The latter return, coupled with paper 29, shows that 37 Fulton votes were cast at that election, and yet none were counted in that county for Representative in Congress. It appears that the votes were in this case, as in the last, sent through the mistake of the officers to one county instead of being distributed. This will not, in our judgment, warrant us in rejecting any of these votes except the 2 which are unexplained, and should be deducted from the vote of Mr. Koontz. Mr. Coffroth is entitled to 29, and Mr. Koontz to 56. In our judgment, then, the Adams and Bedford judges were not legal members of that district board which made the return in favor of Mr. Coffroth.

But the gentleman insists, and the majority of the committee seem to be of the opinion that we must stop at the county board returns, that even if we go behind the district board returns, we cannot go down nearer to the ballot-box than the returns of the county boards.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose being to ascertain who were and who were not the lawful members of these district boards, I would like to know by what rule we are limited to any particular kind of evidence for the purpose of arriving at a result. I would like especially to know how it happens that we are restricted to the evidence which the Governor used, which has no legal character, which was not provided for either by the law of Pennsylvania, or the United States, or by any other law.

It was insisted, I repeat, that if we should go behind the return of the district board, we ought to stop at the county board returns as conclusive, including the majority returns of Adams and Bedford counties. We cannot assent to this proposition. A scrutiny of the law will show that when two or more counties are embraced in one congressional district, as in the case before us, the county returns differ, in material points, both from the soldiers' elementary returns and from the district return. The law provides official depositories of the returns of the military election judges, and of the district board, namely, the offices of the secretary of the Commonwealth and of the prothonotary of the county. But for the return of the county board, when two or more counties are embraced in one district, no official depository is provided. It has but one office, namely, to transmit to the district board in an aggregate form the official declarations, made by the precinct judges, of the result of the elections by them held, and when that office is performed its mission is so completely ended that the law provides no place where it may be afterward preserved. Both the return of the district board and the soldiers' elementary returns are preserved in public offices, and coming from official depositories duly certified are of themselves lawful evidence before us. But the return of the county board, as an official paper, has no existence after the board has met and acted, and can come before us in no legal form of proof, except by the admission of the parties, although it might also in a regular contest be received as part of a deposition. The Adams and Bedford returns are before the committee by admission of the parties, but that admission is mutual, and embraces the papers of both or of neither. It will be a strange proceeding if Mr. Coffroth, after getting his majority returns before the committee by such conditional assent of his competitor, shall be permitted to turn round and repudiate the conditions, and convert his papers, which are here only by sufferance, into conclusive returns. Mr. Koontz could, of course, with no greater injustice, make the same preposterous demand.

But, in addition to this, the majority return of Adams county is confronted by a paper of equal authority before us, signed by the same judges at the same time and place, which must be taken as a part of the instrument itself. From the two papers it appears that certain votes were not counted for reasons which the precinct returns show to have been unlawful, and the return is a nullity. It is also confronted by the minority return, which shows that the majority return was made in the face of the actual opposition of the minority, and is therefore of at least doubtful validity.

With reference to these two certificates which have been commented upon by the gentleman from Michigan, I have to say that the law of Pennsylvania evidently does not contemplate that they shall be used as credentials before this House. The law makes no provision for their transmittal either by the Governor or any other officer of the State of Pennsylvania to this House. It makes no provision for depositing them in any office of the State of Pennsylvania, and if they do come before this House, presented by the gentlemen themselves, they come flatly contradicted by the proclamation of the Governor, who declared, having all these papers before him, as is shown by the documentary proofs before this House, that there had been no election.

Mr. UPSON. If there is no office in which to deposit the returns, how could the district board obtain any returns for Somerset county by adjourning over?

Mr. PAINE. I am now speaking of the certificates given by the two district boards to the respective contestants. Does the gentleman ask me about those or something else?

Mr. UPSON. I was inquiring about the returns of the county board of judges to the district board.

Mr. PAINE. I was not speaking of those. The certificate of the district board is given to the successful candidate.

Mr. UPSON. This we have certified here.

Mr. PAINE. I am not now speaking of the technical returns, but of the certificate so-called, which is a mere notification to the candidate of his election, not required by law to contain any statement of the vote, but only the simple announcement of his election; an instrument provided by the Legislature as a mere notification to the successful candidate, and not designed to be kept here. I say that the certificate in favor of Mr. Coffroth comes before us, not authenticated, but contradicted by the proclamation of the Governor, signed only by four out of the five judges of that district, contradicted by the certificate and by the return in favor of Mr. Koontz, and contradicted by the return in favor of Mr. Coffroth himself, in which it is expressly stated that all the votes of that district were not counted, that the vote of Somerset county was excluded.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the House to the vote as it stands in the judgment of the minority of the committee. There is a portion of this vote about which there is no dispute. It embraces all of Franklin, Fulton, and Somerset counties, part of Adams county, the home vote of Bedford county, and part of the soldiers' vote of Bedford county. But there are military election returns which are disputed. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Upson] went through with those returns. He insists that they should be rejected. We insist that they should be counted. If they are counted, as we insist they should be, then in looking at the returns, poll-books, and tally-lists, all taken together, you have a majority for Mr. Koontz of 32 votes. Looking only at the returns and not at the tally-papers or poll-books, you have a majority of 14 in favor of Mr. Koontz. Now, if you throw out Barracks No 1, on which the gentleman from Michigan has dwelt so long, you still have a majority in favor of Mr. Koontz. And if you throw out the whole of the Bedford county rejected soldiers' vote—both of those two returns—you still elect him by a majority of 5. You can throw out both those soldiers' returns over which the gentleman has been so sorely exercised, and still you must give the seat to Mr. Koontz, because he still has a majority of votes. And for the reasons which we have given at length in our minority report, and which, coupled with the majority report, I think it is but justice to both of these contestants that the House should read at length, I believe that Mr. Koontz is entitled to a seat on this floor.

But it is said that even though the district board return in favor of Mr. Coffroth was a nullity, though it did not embrace the vote of all the counties, you ought to accept it for the four counties which it does embrace, and look elsewhere for proof as to the Somerset county vote.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended indefinitely.

No objection was made.

Mr. PAINE. I thank the House, and will not trespass upon its time more than ten minutes longer.

It is urged that inasmuch as the vote of Somerset county would not affect the result, the return of the Coffroth district board ought to be held as conclusive in regard to the other four counties, for otherwise Mr. Koontz would be permitted to profit by the wrong of his own partisan. I will state in brief the reasons why we were unable to adopt that view, and then will leave the case to the House.

1. The Governor, if he had not gone behind the returns of the rival district boards to ascertain by testimony who were the real district judges, would have been compelled either to do nothing or proclaim Mr. Koontz elected. On its face his return was perfect. Every judge who signed it had been a county return judge, and if he appeared in a district board with a county return, had a prima facie right to be there, which could only be defeated by showing that some other judge had in fact been selected by the county board to represent it in the district board. The Coffroth return was, on its face, worthless as a return upon which to base the Governor's proclamation. The law requires the Governor "to declare by proclamation the names of the persons so returned as elected." It by no means permits him to base his proclamation in part on the return and in part on evidence obtained aliunde. For the same reasons we must, if we do not go behind the return to inquire who were the lawful district judges, give the seat to Mr. Koontz on his return alone.

2. The Coffroth return having, therefore, no legal character, either before the Governor or the committee, whatever regard we may give it will be a mere gratuity. It would certainly be a novelty if such an instrument should be conclusive. To withhold from it such conclusive character can be no real hardship to Mr. Coffroth, if he was not in fact elected. It cannot be a hardship to a claimant, who has neither a technical nor a substantial claim, to decline arbitrarily to provide him with a technical one, and hold it conclusive. On the contrary, to do so would be to wrong his competitor, if that competitor's claim, although not technically perfect, rested on a basis of real merit. If Mr. Coffroth had in fact a majority of the lawfully returned votes, it might well be called a hardship to suffer a partisan of Mr. Koontz, by a raid upon the district board, to rob him of his seat, but it cannot be said that this ought, of itself, to give the seat to Mr. Coffroth if he did not in fact receive a majority of the votes, and had no chance of success, except through a previous raid of his own partisans on the soldiers' returns.

Mr. UPSON. I am informed that two or three gentlemen wish to say a few words upon this subject who have left the House in the belief that no vote would be taken to-day. They wish to be heard briefly before the vote is taken on Monday. I suggest, therefore, that the matter be postponed until after the morning hour on Monday, unless, indeed, there is a general desire to have the vote taken now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think we should take no vote to-day, as I know several gentlemen have left the Hall with the understanding that no vote would be taken to-night.

Mr. STEVENS. I heard several gentlemen say they expected no vote would be taken to-night.

Mr. UPSON. Then I move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until Monday next after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

CALIFORNIA LAND TITLES.

On motion of Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, bill of the Senate, No. 93, to quiet the titles to certain lands within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informing the House that that body had concurred in the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 61, to establish certain post roads; and also notifying the House that that body had passed bills of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 93) to quiet title to certain lands within the corporate limits of San Francisco;

An act (S. No. 132) to prevent and punish kidnapping; and

An act (S. No. 117) for the relief of F. A. Patterson, late a captain of the third Virginia cavalry.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. ORTH. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on reconstruction be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting to this House an amendment to the Constitution providing that no person who held any office, civil or military, in the so-called confederacy, shall ever be eligible to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government.

Mr. LE BLOND. I object.

MEDICAL STATISTICS.

Mr. TAYLOR, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be, and is hereby, requested to inquire into the expediency and utility of making such an appropriation as will enable the Surgeon General of the United States to compile from the reports and other facts and statistics within his possession, a medical and surgical history of the rebellion; and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

ALBERT NEVINS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having commenced, the House resumes the consideration of the bill reported on Friday last from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and pending when the morning hour expired on that day, for the relief of Albert Nevins.

The bill was read. It provides that the name of Albert Nevins, late a private in company K, ninety-second regiment New York volunteers, shall be placed upon the list of pensioners at the rate of twenty-five dollars per month, in lieu of eight dollars per month heretofore allowed him, to commence from the passage of this act.

The report was read.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VAN AERNAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLERK TO SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution, and ask that it be referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be authorized to employ an additional clerk in his office.

Mr. FINCK. I object.

PENSIONS IN CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, by unanimous consent introduced a joint resolution relative to pensions in the civil service; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BANKS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to proceed to the consideration of the private bills on the Speaker's table for reference to their appropriate committees.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. With the condition that they shall not be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. BANKS. Certainly.

No objection was made, and the House proceeded to the consideration of private bills upon the Speaker's table.

J. B. RITTENHOUSE.

A bill (S. No. 80) for the relief of J. B. Rittenhouse, fleet paymaster of the Pacific squadron, was then taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

JANE W. NETHAWAY.

A bill (S. No. 115) for the relief of Jane W. Nethaway was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

F. A. PATTERSON.

A bill (S. No. 117) for the relief of F. A. Patterson, late captain of the third Virginia cavalry, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MARY C. HAMILTON.

A bill (S. No. 56) granting a pension to Mary C. Hamilton was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HEIRS OF JAMES BAWDIN.

A bill (S. No. 142) for the relief of the heirs of James Bawdin was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SARAH FITZGIBBON.

A bill (S. No. 82) granting a pension to Sarah Fitzgibbon was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MINERALS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BANKS. There is on the Speaker's table a joint resolution of the Senate in relation to the exhibition of specimens of the minerals of the United States, which I ask to have taken up and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The title of the joint resolution was reported as follows: Joint resolution (S. No. 27) for the exhibition of gold, silver, and other minerals, the product of the United States.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let it be read.

The joint resolution was read at length. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to set apart in the Patent Office building such space as may be spared for the arrangement and exhibition, in proper cases, of such specimens of gold, silver, and other minerals as may be contributed for the purpose by citizens of the United States; the specimens to be considered as deposits, to be duly receipted for, and to remain the property of the depositors, and subject to their orders.

Mr. BANKS. I move that this joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The motion was agreed to.

SEWERAGE IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to establish a uniform system of sewerage in the city of Washington, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

WAGON ROAD TO MONTANA, ETC.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to the House of Representatives the report of Colonel James A. Sawyers, superintendent of the wagon road from Niobrara to Virginia City, made in 1865, of his explorations, survey, and location of said road, and also the report of W. W. Brooks, superintendent of the wagon road from the western line of Minnesota to Montana, showing his exploration and surveys.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, unanimous consent is necessary for its consideration on this day.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. COOK. I ask unanimous consent to report a bill from the Committee on the Judiciary, simply that it may be printed and recommitted. It is a bill to amend an act entitled "An act relative to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I ask that the bill be read.

The bill was read in extenso.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reporting of the bill for the purpose indicated?

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I object.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. This bill is pending before the Committee on the Judiciary; and the only design now is to have it printed, in order that it may be in the possession of members of the House. Otherwise it must be reported without being printed.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Let the bill take the regular course. It is a measure which is designed to rob the State courts of their rightful jurisdiction; and I do not see why we should make any departure from the regular order for the purpose of facilitating its passage.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman from Kentucky desires it, the motion to recommit can be adopted, with the understanding that the bill shall not be brought back by a motion to reconsider. In that way the bill will occupy the same position that it now does.

Mr. SMITH. I trust that my colleague will withdraw his objection.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Does the gentleman see anything in the bill to admire?

Mr. SMITH. I do see in it a great deal to admire.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I do not.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky insist on his objection?

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I do.

The SPEAKER. Then the order for the printing of the bill cannot be made at this time.

EXPORTATION OF ARMS TO MEXICO.

Mr. McKEE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the House, if not inconsistent with the public interest, any correspondence or other information in possession of the State Department, in regard to General Order No. 17, issued by the commander of the department of California, and dated San Francisco, October 11, 1865, instructing the United States officers commanding the districts of Arizona and southern California to suffer no arms or munitions of war to be exported over the frontier; and whether this discrimination is a breach of our neutrality toward our sister republic of Mexico; and whether the Government has taken any action in the premises.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, unanimous consent is necessary for its consideration on this day.

Mr. BANKS. I object; and I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. McKEE. I consent to that.

The motion of Mr. BANKS was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to inquire into the expediency and practicability of assessing the major part of our internal duties upon distilled spirits, tobacco, and cotton, and dispensing with those which affect our small domestic manufactures and the validity of instruments of writing.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

SWAMP AND OVERFLOWED LANDS.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of purchasers and locaters of swamp and overflowed lands," approved March 2, 1855; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

STENOGRAPHERS FOR FEDERAL COURTS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize the appointment of stenographers in certain courts of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill authorizes the judges of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York, of the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York, and of the district and circuit courts for the eastern district of New York, to appoint stenographers for said courts, as follows: one stenographer each for the district and circuit courts for the southern district, and one for the district and circuit courts for the eastern district jointly. It is made the duty of the stenographers so appointed to take full stenographic notes of all proceedings of trials had in said courts, and to make a transcript of such notes whenever the judge may so direct; and also to furnish a copy to any party to a suit who may demand the same upon payment of the fees allowed for such copy. The bill also provides for the compensation of such stenographers.

And then, on motion of Mr. RADFORD, (at four o'clock p. m.), the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 17, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BORTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The SPEAKER stated, under the order of the House, no business was in order except debate as in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's message, on which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cook] was entitled to the floor.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. COOK. Every individual citizen of each State in the Union has rights in every other State—the right to acquire, possess, and dispose of property; the right to fix his domicile in any State, and to enjoy every civil and political right or privilege possessed by the citizens of such State; and to require that every State and every citizen of every State should contribute a proper share toward the common defense of the nation and bear a proportionate part of all public burdens. And these rights he has, not by virtue of any State authority, but by virtue of the Constitution of the United States. The individual citizen sustains no relation to the national Government through or by authority of the State governments, but through the Constitution of the United States; and this Constitution, which secures to him these rights in each State, is superior in authority, in respect to questions affecting the whole people, to any State authority. Hence it is impossible that the action of any State can take such State out of the Union in such sense that the rights of the citizens of any other State shall be abrogated therein, or the authority of the United States Government, which is the act of all the people of all the States, shall be subverted or impaired.

State governments are political corporations, and derive their existence and powers as States in the Union from the assent of the whole people of the United States. The whole people of any State can go into rebellion against the national Government, and in such case there can be no State government in such State acting in accord with the national Government under the Constitution. And so when such a controlling majority of the people of any State have thrown off their allegiance to the Constitution and Government of the Union that the political authority of the State has been arrayed in active hostility to the nation, then such State government is destroyed and dead. It derives its life and power from its accord with the Federal Constitution and Government, and when it is hostile to them it ceases to have power rightfully to bind any loyal man in its borders. This must be conceded by all who admit that the Constitution and the laws enacted under it are the supreme law of the land. Then it follows that a State may go out of the Union in such sense as to lose all right to exercise any authority in the Government, and all right to be represented in the national councils.

It is said that there have always been loyal men in those States who have all the rights of representation in Congress that men in loyal States have, and that their right in this respect could not be affected by the action of any number of rebels in those States. The answer is, the manner of the exercise of these rights must be prescribed by State law; these men cannot act except through State organizations. There must be a Legislature to elect Senators and to prescribe by law the manner of electing Representatives, and the State governments necessary to do this may be, and actually have been, entirely destroyed in these southern States by the rebellion.

The question whether these States are in or out of the Union seems to me to be irrelevant to this discussion, darkening counsel by words without knowledge. There is no dispute, so far as I am aware, upon two propositions: First, the States lately in rebellion have never been out of the Union in such sense that the laws of the United States have not been rightfully in full force in their bounds, or in such sense that it has not been within the authority of Congress to levy and collect taxes in those States, or within the duty of the President to cause the laws of the United States to be faithfully executed to the full extent of the power which he could bring to bear for that purpose; second, that there has been a time extending through nearly four years when there was no loyal State organizations in those States, no States with State governments acting within the Union and under the Constitution. Whether gentlemen on this floor believe that the State of South Carolina has now a State organization capable of electing members of the Senate of the United States and of providing by law for the election of members of this House or not, no one will contend that there has not been a time extended for years when there was no Legislature in that State capable of electing any man, however loyal, to the Senate of the United States, or capable of enacting any law rightfully binding any loyal man. Now, whether you call a State which is in this condition in the Union or out of the Union, is a mere question of words. I should define it to be within the Union for all purposes of the execution of the national laws, and without the Union in so far that it has no government organized in accordance with the Constitution and acting in harmony with the Federal Government or capable of exercising any control in its affairs. When it is alleged that certain gentlemen upon this floor agree with the secessionists of the South because they say that certain States have no State governments within the Union, the argument is manifestly unreasonable and unfair, a mere trick of words, because a different meaning is attached to the words "out of the Union" in the two cases. The rebel means by that phrase out from the control of the national law. The loyal man means under the national law, but having no State government capable of exercising any share in the national Government.

That these States were not in the Union for the purpose of electing President and Vice President at the last election was certainly the view of those who voted for the following resolution, which passed this House without dissent:

Whereas the inhabitants and local authorities of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee rebelled against the Government of the United States, and were in such condition on the 8th day of November, 1864, that no valid election for electors of President and Vice President of the United States, according to the Constitution and laws thereof, was held therein on said day: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the States mentioned in the preamble to this joint resolution are not entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President and Vice President of the United States, for the term of office commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865; and no electoral votes shall be received or counted from said States concerning the choice of President and Vice President for said term of office.

The real and practical question, however, before us is this: when the relations between a State and the Federal Union have been broken by treason; when the constitution of the State under which it became one of the United States is subverted; when the State has no relation to the other States in the Union than that of a public enemy; when this condition of affairs is recognized and affirmed by every department in the Government, by the Congress in solemnly declaring that such States are wholly in rebellion, and forbidding loyal men from carrying on any trade or commerce with them, by the President in proclaiming their ports blockaded, by the Supreme Court in solemnly deciding that their ships and vessels are lawful prizes of war; when the people have openly thrown aside all allegiance to the national Government, and have required all who exercise authority in the State to take an oath to overthrow instead of to support the Constitution, how shall such State be restored to its former relation to and authority in the national Government? By what action; whether by the action of the President alone, either as President or as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, or by the action of Congress and the President as the law-making power? This question I shall briefly discuss. The Constitution provides that the United States shall guaranty to each State a republican form of government at some time and in some manner; then the United States, including the whole law-making power, the Congress as well as the President, must have the right to pass upon the government of a State, and to decide whether it is in accordance with the Constitution. Accordingly this is done when new States present their constitutions and are received into the Union, or when they come into the Union in pursuance of enabling acts of Congress, in which the character of the constitution to be framed has been limited and defined. If these constitutions are afterward legally altered, it is by virtue and in pursuance of their own provisions, and the new government retains the character of the old, to which Congress has given its assent. But suppose an attempt should be made to change the government of a State by a majority of the people in a manner not authorized by the constitution in force, but wholly independent of it, could the State constitution be so changed without the assent of Congress?

This is not a question of first impression. It has been solemnly adjudicated by the highest tribunal in the land. In 1841 a portion of the people of the State of Rhode Island attempted to alter the organic law of that State, and a case afterward arose which was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States. In the trial of this case one party offered to prove that a large majority of all the voters of the State of Rhode Island voted for this new constitution and approved it, and so the case stood precisely as though it had been conceded that a majority of the voters of that State had ordained that constitution as the fundamental law of Rhode Island.

The material question in that case was, what was the legal State organization in Rhode Island, and the Supreme Court do say where the decision of that question rests. I quote from the decision of the court in the case of Luther vs. Boddell et al., Howard's Reports, page 42:

"The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion. Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State; for, as the United States guaranty to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in a State before it can determine whether the established one is republican; and when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union the authority of the government under which they are appointed as well as its republican character is reorganized by the proper constitutional authority, and its decision is binding upon every other department of the Government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal. It is true that the contest did not last long enough to bring the matter to this issue, yet the right to decide is placed there."

My colleague [Mr. BAKER] referred briefly to this decision; and in reference to his remarks upon it the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] says:

"The decision of the Supreme Court, in the case of the Dorr rebellion in the State of Rhode Island, has been quoted here to show that it was for Congress to decide when a republican form of government, which they are bound to guaranty, does exist in a State. I have not that decision by me at this time. But I think if gentlemen will read it with special regard for its language and especially qualifying clauses in it, they will discover that the decision was to this effect: that it was for Congress to decide what was a republican form of government by deciding upon the admission of members coming from that government, or elected under it. This is the mode and scope of the action of Congress upon this point, and having decided it the members thus admitted are members of Congress, and laws in the enactment of which they take part are binding upon all the departments of the Government. As I understand it, that is the extent to which upon that point that decision went."

I believe that if the honorable gentleman from New York will read the decision with special regard for its language, he will find that this case is not limited as he supposes, and that whatever it did decide, the points he suggests, which are, that Congress has the exclusive right of deciding who are its own members, and that when they are admitted, laws, in the enactment of which they take part, are binding upon all the departments of Government, were not even before the court. What was this case? It was not a question whether one man or another had been legally elected a member of Congress from Rhode Island; it was not whether laws enacted in part by men whose title to a seat in Congress was disputed were valid laws—by no means; and yet these would have been the questions if the decision had the extent only suggested by the gentleman from New York. But the question was this: two rival organizations were claiming to be the government of the State of Rhode Island: an officer acting under the authority of one was prosecuted by an adherent of the other. The only question was, was the organization under which the plaintiff was acting the legal State government of Rhode Island? It was conceded, for the purposes of that case, that this government was the act of the majority of the voters of Rhode Island. No Senators or Representatives had as yet claimed seats in Congress under its authority; and the decision was, that it was not a State government until Congress had recognized it; that no other department of the Government could give it this recognition; Congress alone could breathe into it the breath of life. "It is true," say the court, "that the contest did not last long enough to bring the matter to this issue, yet the right to decide is placed there, and not in the tribunals."

It has been solemnly decided, therefore, by the highest tribunal in the land:

1. That the right to decide what government is the established one in any State is in Congress.

2. The admission of Senators and Representatives is one mode of recognition by Congress of the authority of the government under which they are appointed, and binds all the departments of the national Government to consider and treat it as the loyal, rightful government of the State.

3. The decision of Congress upon this question is final and conclusive upon the President and every department of the Government.

4. Until Congress has decided the question, it is undecided.

To apply these principles to the case before us. Here are eleven States asking the admission of their Senators and Representatives, and by what authority do they claim this recognition; because they are the old State organizations, once in full relations with the Federal Union organizations, overborne for a time by the violence of treason, but now resuming the authority they had before the war? By no means.

The State governments now seeking recognition in these States are not the same governments that existed before the war, not the same officers, not the same Legislatures, not men elected to office on the same basis of suffrage. They supersede and set aside the old State governments. The officers of many of those States, elected before the war, were commissioned to hold their offices until their successors were elected and qualified under the provisions of the State law then existing. Those successors have never been elected. Those old State governments are all destroyed; there is left no longer any through whom their functions can be exercised. Their Governors, legislators, State officers of every name, became traitors, civilly dead. New governments with reconstructed constitutions ask recognition at our hands. And by whom are they reconstructed? By the whole people, by the loyal people, even by those who have a right to be heard, by those who will truly support and defend the Constitution of the United States? These questions demand an answer, and the Congress of the United States is the only power in the Government that can give the answer.

If the assent of Congress must be given to the admission of a new State in order that it may be determined whether such new State has a republican form of government, if, when there are two organizations, each claiming to be the rightful government of a State, it rests with Congress finally to determine for every department of the Government which is the true State government, as the Supreme Court has expressly decided in the case I have cited, then it assuredly follows, that when the State organization has been subverted and destroyed, the relations between the State and the national Government broken, that Congress is the power that shall determine whether any new organization which claims to be the State government, but which has never been recognized by Congress, is the rightful republican government of the State, whether the organizations in the States lately in rebellion are governments organized by the loyal people of the States, and whether they are governments republican in form, are questions which must be at some time and in some way settled by Congress. It must decide what it has not yet decided—whether the organization in Georgia (I name one State for convenience of illustration) is the act and choice of the loyal people of that State, for it is as their act and choice only that it can have any claim to be considered as a government, or whether, if this organization is not fairly the act of the loyal people, and is not created in pursuance of any law of Congress, it is yet better to recognize it as the basis for a reconstruction of the Union; and I affirm, upon the authority of the case cited, that until Congress has decided these questions, they are not decided.

But one year ago the State of Georgia was in the power of traitors; the power of the State was used to subvert the Constitution and overthrow the Government; her citizens had been arrayed in arms against the soldiers of the Republic; she had no actual relations with the national Government except those which exist between belligerent communities. Now, by whose act does that State resume its relations with the General Government and become entitled to be represented in Congress, to aid in directing the councils of the nation in making its laws and in preserving its life and power? Can it come back by its own State action? Can rebels and traitors, by their own act, become entitled to send Representatives to this House? Is there this element of death in our political system? If not, does the amnesty act or the special pardon of the President form the individuals thus pardoned into State governments fully invested with the powers of loyal States, and requiring no assent of the people of the United States, through their Representatives, to their resuming their place in the Union? Do those who have no State governments, because they are pardoned for acts of treason, become thereby State governments upon which Congress shall have no right to pass and to declare whether they are republican in form? A pardon confers only a capacity to take political rights, and thus enables individuals to become the bases of a political organization known as a State.

Has the President the power to restore these State governments? The Constitution gives to the President, as President, authority only to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed;" but it has not submitted to his judgment the question whether any State has a republican form of government.

So, too, as relates to the clause in the same article of the Constitution providing for cases of domestic violence. It rested with Congress to fulfill this guarantee. Congress provided that the President, upon application of the Legislature, or, when it could not be convened, of the Executive of any State, should call forth the militia to suppress insurrection. If the insurrection should assume such proportions as to destroy all State organizations and all civil government, then, when the insurrection is suppressed and there is no armed enemy in hostility to the Government, it is the duty of the President, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, to control the rebellious States thus reduced to subjection, to keep order, to prevent anarchy; and if, in his judgment, the best way to do this is to appoint provisional governors, and to say to the people, if you choose, in a certain way which I point out, to get together and make regulations for the management of your own internal affairs, I will help you; and when I, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, am satisfied with what you have done, I will do—what? Declare your reorganized governments republican in form, and now in full relations with the national Government, and of equal power in that Government with the loyal States? Not so. But I will withdraw the Army, and my direct control of your affairs shall cease.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. There is a class of opinion in this House, which I will say is not my own opinion, for I agree with the position taken by the gentleman from Illinois, there is a class of opinion here like this: although it is true, as indicated in the decision in the case of Luther vs. Borden, that the political department of the Government is to determine when a loyal State government or a republican State government is established in a State and decide which of two contending governments is the government of a State, yet under the act of 1795, the political department of the Government, to wit, Congress of the United States, has delegated the power to make that determination or recognition to the President of the United States, and that, therefore, as it is delegated by Congress to the President under the act of 1795, it is competent for the President in the exercise and execution of that power to make that recognition; that the President has in fact made that recognition; that in that way, through the delegated powers derived under the act of 1795, he has recognized those States in such a way as to be binding upon Congress. I should like to hear the gentleman's views as to this class of opinions.

Mr. COOK. In reply to the question proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, I have to say my view is this: while the power has been delegated to the President by the act of 1795 for the purpose of putting down an insurrection which does not go to the extent of abrogating the government of a State; while he may decide under that law the rebellion is put down and the old Government is restored to the exercise of full power, yet, after the rebellion has gone to the extent of subverting the State government, it does not clothe him with the power to recognize another government set up in such way that its Senators and Representatives are entitled to seats in Congress. If it be true, when the State government is utterly subverted and overthrown, the President of the United States has the power to say, when the people of a State are again in accord with the people of the Union and the national Government, you will have the spectacle presented of a granted power overriding State and national authority. There is no escape from it. The case supposed is not applicable, for before the President can act under the law of 1795 there must be the demand of a State Governor or Legislature, and when the rebellion is suppressed such Governor and Legislature remain in power. There is no power of reconstruction here. Could Congress grant a power in 1795 which should conclude it now. Suppose the Executive two years ago had recognized the rebel government of South Carolina; would Congress have been bound thereby? If you reply that it was a rebel government, I answer, that is begging the question. I want to be sure that these southern governments are loyal, a proposition not entirely beyond question.

It is, however, to my mind too clear for argument that any government established in those States, or either of them, is, to the extent that it is the act of the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, a purely military government. A provisional governor appointed by the President, as Commander-in-Chief, as the provisional governors of these southern States were, is a military officer, a commander of an army; as such can make only military appointments and establish only military governments. A purely civil function of government cannot be performed by a purely military officer; and to judge and determine when States which have utterly destroyed their loyal civil governments, have established others republican in form, is a question purely for the civil authorities.

It then follows as well from reason as from the authority cited that these States which have been without any legally organized governments for four years, and have now reorganized their State governments, must submit to Congress the question whether these reorganized governments are the acts of persons authorized to form State governments, that is of loyal men, and whether they are republican in form. It is said with great earnestness that the President has the only power to determine when the rebellion is over and to end military authority, leaving the States to the restored and reconstructed governments. Where does this principle lead? Let me state it in other words: it is, the President has a right to determine when force is necessary to execute the law; has a right to set up military government in place of any overthrown by disloyalty; and then has the right to determine when those military governments shall end, which involves the right to determine how long they shall continue; and we might have the extraordinary spectacle presented of the different departments of the Government differing in opinion as to whether an organization claiming to be a State government was really so or not; the Executive holding that there was no legal State government, and that he, as Commander-in-Chief, must set up and continue military government in such State, and Congress admitting Senators and Representatives claiming seats under the authority of the State organizations thus set aside by the President, a conflict would result which would render the harmonious operation of our Government wholly impossible.

These States, it is said, cannot at any time be controlled by Congress. While the rebellion exists and their people are in arms against the Government, they are to be controlled by military government, and when the rebellion ceases they are at once to be remitted to all their rights as States, and that it is purely in the discretion of the Commander-in-Chief to say when these military governments shall cease. But are not these military governments, while they exist, under the control of Congress? Is there in our Government any purely military officer, whether he be Commander-in-Chief of the Army, Lieutenant General, or any other officer who is independent of the law-making power? Could not Congress, by law, provide that no military officer should assume any function of civil government, or regulate by law the extent to which he might assume civil control? Did not Congress during the war prescribe by law what should be done by the military with slaves? Congress, says the Constitution, shall have power to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces, including, as I suppose, the commander of the forces and the military governments administered by them.

Those who deny to Congress all right to legislate for these States lately in arms against the Government must deny that military government could be established at any time and for any period in those States, that they must be left to anarchy, or they must affirm that there is a military power in the Government superior to the civil power, not under the control of the law-making power, and consequently not under the control of law.

Congress has by law provided that in case of insurrection in any State too strong for the civil power to suppress, upon the demand of the Legislature, or Governor, if the Legislature could not be convened, the President shall call out the militia to suppress it; but in the case before us there was no such demand—Governors and Legislatures were rebels alike. The President must see that the laws are faithfully executed, and under this power troops were called for and armies raised; but is it not too clear for argument that, in simply enforcing the laws, he must of necessity act in subordination to the law-making power?

If, then, any State which is rightfully under the control of a military government is rightfully under the control of Congress, ought not Congress to determine when such military government should cease and such State resume its relations with the General Government which have been broken? That recognition by Congress of the State government by the admission of Senators and Representatives should not be made until military control in those States ceases to be a necessity, unless this military control can exist after such State has thus resumed its equal place in the national Government.

The question then arises whether, when a State is in full relation with the General Government, when the State government has been recognized by Congress, authority yet remains in the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army to exercise military control in that State. I admit that when an insurrection exists in any State too strong to be suppressed by the State, and when the proper State authority has called upon the President for aid, that the commander of the forces engaged in suppressing the insurrection may proclaim martial law, and may for the time suspend the action of the civil tribunals; but when a State has no legal State government, and is ruled by military authority alone, can a State government be organized, and the relations between that government and the national Government be fully restored, and yet military government exist in the State? In other words, if the people of any State are in rebellion and insurrection and so amenable to military law, ought they to be represented in Congress? If the rebellion has ceased and the insurrection is suppressed and the loyal State government restored, can military government longer be maintained in such State? In another form the question is, can the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army in any State where no actual state of war is existing, set aside the civil authority and annul the enactments of the Legislature? If this is so, there is no authority in this Government, State or national, except the Executive. And this is a fair statement of the question before us; for it is a matter of history that in six distinct instances have the military authorities, acting under the direction of the President in the southern States, set aside the laws enacted by the Legislatures of States which it is insisted are fully reorganized and have resumed their relations with the Union. If these governments, organized under the direction of the Commander-in-Chief, are military governments, such exercise of power was proper and right. If they are State governments, as is claimed, with equal authority in the Union with other States, the doctrine insisted upon would place all State governments within the control of the national Executive. I affirm that until the rebel States are loyal enough to remain peaceable members of the national Union of their own accord and without the coercion of the national armies, they are not entitled to assist in governing the nation.

In 1861 and 1862 the doctrine was to some extent received that although the loyal State governments had been overthrown, and all the men holding State offices and the controlling majority of the voters were traitors, yet the Representatives of such State might still remain in Congress; and disloyal men held seats upon this floor until the war began and then went from these Halls to join the ranks of our enemies in the field. Suppose all the Representatives and Senators had held their seats, and had thus retained the power in conjunction with the northern men who always voted with them to embarrass the action of the national Government, (and there was no two-thirds majority of loyal men to expel them at that time,) is it not apparent to every man that in those two years our country would have been ruined, and treason would have triumphed? If we have learned nothing by this experience, is it certain that those who to-day would destroy the Government if they could are equally dull of apprehension? It is certainly possible that the men who for four years have striven so earnestly to overthrow this Government, and have periled so much in their efforts to destroy it, cannot safely be intrusted with the control of it; and that to place the political power of the nation in their hands would only give them a weapon for its destruction more effective than the bayonets which they used against its life while they had the power to do so. Certainly there are precedents of this sort so fresh in our memories that they cannot pass unheeded. Five years ago men held seats in this Hall and in the Senate, ay, and in the Cabinet of the President, who were bound, so far as oaths can bind such men, to support the Constitution of the United States, and with the oath of God fresh upon their lips were plotting and earnestly endeavoring to secure its utter subversion. After four years of bloody war has intensified every feeling of bitterness then existing, have we the entire assurance that oaths of loyalty enforced by the power of the national armies will be more binding and more effective than the oaths which heretofore were so freely taken and so basely broken? Shall we have no guarantees from these men before we admit them once more to make laws for loyal men? Shall we intrust to their decision the questions whether we shall preserve the public faith by repaying the money which loyal men among us have advanced to sustain the Government in the time of its need, and whether we shall pay the pensions we have promised to the soldiers who, in endeavoring to sustain the Government, have by the hands of these same men been mutilated and disabled?

But it is said that we refuse to admit loyal men to seats in this House, and the names of honorable and loyal gentlemen from the State of Tennessee are sounded in our ears from day to day as if this question were a purely personal one to them. I have the honor of the acquaintance of some of them, and if the question of their admission concerned them alone

I should rejoice to vote for their admission, but it is not so. The admission of these loyal men from Tennessee means full recognition of the State with all the powers belonging to any State in the Union; it means the withdrawal of military government, not the troops, perhaps, but the Government, for it cannot be that it will be claimed that the old axioms of the fathers are to be reversed and the civil power of a State subordinated to the military power; it means the abandonment of the Union men of that State to the control of the Legislature and the courts of that State, and that, too, when the Governor of that State has publicly declared, in a letter to the Speaker of this House—

"If the removal of the Federal troops from Tennessee must necessarily follow upon the admission of our congressional delegation to their seats, why then and in that case the loyal men of Tennessee beg to be without Representatives in Congress. I tell you, and through you all whom it may concern, that without a law to disfranchise rebels, and a force to carry out the provisions of that law, this State will pass into the hands of the rebels, and a terrible state of affairs is bound to follow. Union men will be driven from the State, forced to sacrifice what they have and seek homes elsewhere. And yet Tennessee is in a much better condition than any of the other revolted States, and affords a stronger loyal population."

Where it is apparent that the judges who are holding their office by appointment of the Governor could not be elected by the people, and when the Union men of Tennessee are saying to us such words as are contained in the memorial of the Union State central committee—

"Supposing the supervising power of the General Government withdrawn from Tennessee, and assuming that, to some extent at least, the passions, prejudices, and resentments of the majority of the people will be reflected in their legislation, it is not difficult to anticipate the true policy and the character of the civil and judicial administration which will prevail. It may be safely assumed—

"First. That so far as possible, in legislation and the bestowal of patronage, and the management of all public affairs, the late rebels will be the preferred class, and that all the acts of the rebel State government, including the removal and destruction of the State banks and State treasury, the disarming and conscripting the people and the impressment of their property, and all the acts of rebel officers, soldiers, and guerrillas will be legalized. Those who have been robbed, wounded, and imprisoned will go unredressed, while those who have inflicted those injuries will be justified in law, as they now are in public sentiment.

"Second. As is even now the case in many localities, services rendered and wounds received in the confederate cause will be passports to preferment, while to have taken sides with the cause of the Union will be equivalent to a judgment of infamy, forever consigning the offender to obscurity and disgrace.

"Third. If the Legislature does not vote thanks and medals to southern heroes and unite with other southern States to pay the confederate debt, it will be from fear or policy, and not from want of sympathy or desire.

"Fourth. As far as possible, restrictions will be thrown around the negro, and his elevation in the scale of being discountenanced, if not actually prohibited; he will be excluded from the courts, from common schools, and probably from all means of education, from business and privileged occupations, and perhaps from the acquisition of property.

"The returned rebel soldiers, and those who affiliate with them, openly boast that at the next general elections they will obtain entire control of the State government. Indeed, it is now the case in many counties, that those who have been most notorious for their advocacy and support of rebellion are the first to receive the support of the people for office. Service in the rebel army is, in many parts of the State, the best passport to position and power, while to have been connected with the Union Army is regarded as affixing a stigma, 'deeper and more indelible than the brand upon the brow of Cain.'

"Under the appointing power, as exercised by Governor Brownlow, we now have a loyal judiciary; yet all their power and influence cannot prevent rebel injuries from practicing the grossest injustice toward loyal men, while it is almost impossible to bring rebel offenders to justice. Should the judiciary of our State fall into rebel control, sad indeed will be the condition of those who, trusting to the nation's faith, have breasted the storm of treason here. In a social and business point of view Union men and Union families are proscribed and insulted."

The mere presence of troops in Tennessee cannot prevent the ascendancy of disloyal men in her Legislature, and unless, as in Mississippi and in Georgia, the military actually do set aside the acts of the Legislature, the Union men and the freedmen can have no protection from us. I believe that the State of Tennessee is perhaps an exceptional case; that more of her people have been loyal during the war; that she has by law declared that black men may testify in court and enjoy equal civil rights with white men; and I know that the men she sends here are loyal men. What I want to know is this:

can those loyal men maintain their ascendancy in Tennessee? In recognizing them we recognize those who shall come after them, when it will be too late to deny such recognition. Can loyal men hold the Legislature of Tennessee? Will the judges appointed by Governor Brownlow, not elected, be succeeded by loyal judges elected by the people? Will the Union men and freedmen be safe if we place it out of our power to help them? If we recognize the State government of Tennessee without exacting any guarantees against the assumption of the rebel debt, shall we not set a precedent which it will be unsafe to follow with other southern States? I do not answer these questions; I only ask them. I look for the answer to the committee whom we have charged to inquire, and I will await their answer, at least until I am willing by my vote to brand them with bad faith or culpable remissness in their high duty.

But there can be no taxation without representation. The two are inseparable. The argument so persistently urged surely has not been well considered, or it would be seen that men may rightfully be deprived of representation for such period as may be necessary for the safety of the Government; and the very men who urge this maxim of no taxation without representation are acting upon this theory. Whom do they ask to be represented upon this floor? All Tennessee? No; a minority of the people of Tennessee. The State government they ask to be recognized forbids a majority of the tax-payers of the State from voting, (white tax-payers.) They ask recognition, because they exclude rebels from voting. It is taxation without representation on a grand scale, and it is necessary and just. Therefore, the application of the maxim in question is unjust, and the position of those who urge it is obviously illogical. If it is true that the military must be superior to the civil authority in those States, shall we recognize the supreme authority of the civil power and withdraw all military protection from loyal men at a time when evidence is accumulating before us that suits are being brought by hundreds in some of the southern States against Union men who have served in the armies of the nation for acts done under command of their officers; and that these courts are deciding that the command of a military superior furnishes no defense, because no officer had the right to direct that private property be taken for public use without compensation, and the Union soldier is held liable for property of rebels taken at a time when the Army was compelled to subsist upon the country through which it moved, and made to respond in damages for acts without which the country could not have been defended? But on the other hand, when guerrillas are sued for injuries to the property of Union men, these same courts hold that there is no liability, the United States having recognized them as belligerents, and their acts are acts of war; and so Union men are plundered and oppressed. Evidence is not wanting showing also that when Union men bring suits to recover estates which have been confiscated by sentence of the Confederate courts on account of the loyalty of their owners, the State courts are deciding that those sentences of confiscation, being the acts of a de facto government, are valid and binding, and the recovery of the estates of Union men seized by rebels is rendered forever impossible except by the action of the national Government. It is a fact not to be disguised that in all the southern States the spirit of the majority of the people is hostile to the Government of the United States, and that were they once restored to their old place in the Union and the military power withdrawn, the State laws that have been enacted by Legislatures elected by a minority of the people, and which were designed to protect Union men and freedmen, would be swept away, and the judges appointed by such loyal Governors as Brownlow would have to give place to men who would execute the will of the rebel majorities.

Can we now place the freedmen in the uncontrolled power of their former masters? The negro codes enacted by the reconstructed Legislatures of Mississippi and South Carolina are our sufficient answer; codes so malignant in their spirit, so contrary to all the guarantees given to these men when we needed their aid to maintain the Government, that the military commanders, acting under the authority of the President, have set them aside; thus overriding the legislation of States which gentlemen tell us are reconstructed and in full possession of all the powers of any States of this Union. It is apparent that the men who have striven hardest to destroy the nation are the men to whom in many instances will be intrusted the execution of these negro codes. The very Senators and Representatives elected, for the most part are men who were elected because they could not take the oath of loyalty; and to have borne arms against the country, to have slaughtered most of our sons and brothers, is the surer passport to office in these States which we are told are now repentant and loyal.

The recognition of these States now means the abandonment of the loyal men and the freedmen of the South to the mercy of men who hate and despise them for their loyalty. It would present the strange spectacle of the conquerors accepting all the results of defeat; the institutions of the country preserved at a vast cost of life and treasure, only that loyal men should be placed more completely in the power of traitors. Sir, if we abandon these men who have risked all in the defense of the country, and are now defenseless without our aid: if we refuse to protect the freedmen who at our call have aided us to suppress the rebellion, and who are now thrown upon our hands with nothing on earth that they can call their own, helpless and defenseless, we shall be held faithless and dishonored before God and the civilized world. Before the military power of the nation is withdrawn, then, we must have guarantees, both for the security of the nation and for the protection of those who are the wards of the nation and for whose defense the national honor is pledged. And among those guarantees I would require ratification by those States of the amendment of the Constitution which has passed this House forbidding the levy of any tax or impost for the payment of the rebel debt in whole or in part. It is true that in their remodeled constitutions this debt is repudiated, but we cannot forget that this was done under the coercive power of the Government and under the direction of the Commander-in-Chief of the armies, and that they were exceedingly reluctant to repudiate this debt. How did they do it, of their own choice? No, by the stern dictation of the President declaring to them that unless the action which they earnestly desired to take, and did at first take, was reversed, that their reorganization as States in the Union was impossible. If this debt was repudiated with such intense reluctance, is it certain that when all political power is again given to their hands they will not rescind their action? Already in the Legislature of Louisiana resolutions have been offered for the calling of a new convention to amend the constitution of the State, and I venture the prediction that it will not be two years after that State is fully restored to all the rights of a State in this Union before this constitution, which is regarded with aversion by so large a mass of her people, will be replaced by a new organic law. We ought not to leave the question, whether the loyal Union men of the South, who have already suffered so much on account of their devotion to the Union, shall be taxed to refund to rebels the money advanced by them to secure the destruction of the lives and property of loyal men to the decision of the rebels who have advanced the money and seek its repayment.

The question whether Union men of the South shall be required to pay for the destruction of their own property and their own bitter persecution, when they were imprisoned in dungeons and were driven from their homes and hunted like a partridge upon the mountains, is a question to be decided by the loyal men of the nation, and not by the traitors who want the money.

If they, in good faith, have repudiated this debt, there can be no objection on their part to the ratification of this amendment; if not, its ratification is essentially necessary.

I would also require that the amendment of the Constitution, which has passed this House, should be adopted by those States, which should forever destroy the unequal and unjust apportionment of Representatives by which slavery so long succeeded in controlling the Government, and which should secure to loyal men the same influence in the Government which is accorded to rebels. I would say to these men, you must agree to relinquish all claim to a representation based upon the fact that you have among you persons whose education and development you have prohibited by law until you have made each one to amount to three fifths only of a human being, and whom you have never represented, whose views and wishes were never considered, and who were deemed guilty of a crime of unspeakable atrocity when they ventured to petition the men who were elected as their Representatives in this House. You shall not be any stronger in this Government because you have been slaveholders or rebels.

The passage of the bills now before Congress extending the duties of the Freedmen's Bureau, and for the abrogation of all distinctions in civil rights is, in my opinion, absolutely essential. The freedmen are by the action of the Government thrown upon our hands helpless and defenseless. Upon the call of the nation they rallied to its defense; by their aid the nation was saved, and we cannot permit them to suffer without our help. Our Government fed and protected those who had been stolen from Africa and were captured by our cruisers, and who had no claim upon us but one of a common humanity. We have at the present session of Congress passed an act appropriating $500,000 to feed and clothe Indians who had been fighting against the Government in the cause of the rebels; it was passed, too, by the votes of gentlemen who claim that it is unconstitutional to save the helpless and infirm and wounded among the freedmen and refugees from starvation, although they are the families of men who have been fighting our battles, and are suffering on that very account. The same men who declaimed so earnestly upon the unconstitutionality of appropriating money to keep these helpless poor from starvation see clear constitutional power to pay masters for their slaves who were enlisted in the Army.

When the late President of the United States proclaimed the freedom of the slave, and when the nation called upon the colored men to arm in its defense, the pledge of the nation was solemnly given to them that their freedom should be maintained. Did this mean only that they should no longer be bought and sold like beasts in the shambles, or did it mean that they should have the civil rights of freemen; the right to contract for their labor and to compel the performance of contracts made with them; the right to seek their own happiness, restrained like other men only by such laws as should protect the rights of others; the right to acquire and possess property; the right to develop their higher natures by education and culture? If the first only was meant by the proclamation, the President might well have hesitated to have invoked upon that act "the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favor of Almighty God." If the nation did guaranty to them the civil rights of freedmen that pledge must be redeemed; and so far as it is necessary to carry into effect the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery it must be effected by the legislation of Congress.

For myself, I hope to see such amendments to the Constitution and such legislation as will secure impartial justice and equal rights to all men, and will make the grand enunciation of the fathers of the Republic, that God created all men equal, and endowed them with inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and that all just Governments derive their power from the consent of the governed, living, practical truths in all the land. I am well assured that these are the fundamental ideas which underlie all our theory of government, and that upon their complete development the life and progress of the Union depend. We have seen the sure results of injustice and oppression in this land of ours. Are we not wiser now than before we sought to establish iniquity by law, and to enter into a contest in which, to use the idea of Jefferson, every attribute of the Almighty was against us? In the light that streams so full and clear from the last four years of our history, do we not see that they, and they only, win at last who work with God for human liberty and progress?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, obtained the floor but yielded to

Mr. BROOMALL, who said: Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to read some resolutions which I propose to offer when I have the opportunity; but I wish to-day to have the benefit of the criticism of the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Resolved, 1. That in the language of the proclamation of the President of May 29, 1865, "the rebellion which was waged by a portion of the people of the United States against the properly constituted authorities of the Government thereof in the most violent and revolting form, but whose organized and armed forces have now been almost entirely overcome, has in its revolutionary progress deprived the people" of most of the States, in which it was organized "of all civil government."

2. That whenever the people of any State are thus "deprived of all civil government," it becomes the duty of Congress, by appropriate legislation, to enable them to organize a State government, and in the language of the Constitution to guaranty to such State a republican form of government."

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The resolutions proposed by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] declare the fact and the constitutional law upon which rests the true theory of reconstruction. As a further basis for the remarks I design to make I also present resolutions which may be read for information.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the deliberate sense of this House that the condition of the rebel States fully justifies the President in maintaining the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in those States.

Resolved, That it is the deliberate sense of this House that the condition of the rebel States fully justifies the President in maintaining military possession and control thereof, and that the President is entitled to the thanks of the nation for employing the war power for the protection of Union citizens and the freedmen in those States.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The overthrow of the military power of the great rebellion devolved upon the President and Congress and the country duties of unparalleled magnitude.

With all lawful civil State government abandoned and destroyed in the rebellious States, the foundations of political society are again to be laid or restored over a vast extent of country. It is not too much to say, then, that—

"If this work be done wisely now ages unborn shall bless us, and we shall have done in our day what experience approved and duty demanded. If this work shall be carelessly or badly done, countless millions will hereafter remember our folly as their curse; our names and deeds shall only call forth execration and reproach."

Among the great questions now before the country is that of the reconstruction, or, as I think, more properly the creation, of civil State governments in the rebel States, and to that question I propose briefly to speak.

CONDITION OF REBEL STATES—DIFFERENT THEORIES.

There has been much controversy over the condition of the rebel States. It has been said they "are not States," that "they are dead States," "reduced to Territories," "conquered provinces," are "States out of the Union," "out of their practical relations to the Union," and this is denied by asserting that "they never ceased to be States with all the rights of States," or at most that "lawful State government was suspended and is now restored" and is "entitled to resume every right."

But much, not all, of this is a conflict of words rather than of ideas, and may be reconciled by considering what a State is and the effect of rebellion on the several elements which compose it.

THE TRUE THEORY.

The position which I maintain is, that in legal contemplation every ordinance of secession was void; that no State was ever out of the Union; that all lawful State government was abandoned and destroyed in the rebel States; that rebel organizations in the form of State governments were set up unauthorized by and unknown to the Constitution, and with no rights under it; that these were overthrown by the military power of the Union, that the people were thus left without any State government; that it is the duty of the United States to guaranty it, and until this is done there can be no valid de jure permanent civil State government and no right to representation in Congress or the Electoral College.

THE PERFECT STATE—THREE ELEMENTS.

In support of this view let us consider what a State of this Union is. The perfect State consists of three elements, a district of country, a people, and a political corporation or government. (Grotius on War, 265; Phillimore, Int. L., 147; Atlantic Monthly, October, 1863; 3 Dallas, 93; United States vs. Maurice, 2 Brock., 109; 1 Brock., 177; 3 Wheat., 181; 5 Pet., 128.) The Constitution recognizes this threefold character, and for some purposes each of the three elements is treated as a State. It declares that—

"The judicial power shall extend" * * * * * "to controversies between two or more States."

Here the corporate State alone is called the State, since the geographical State or the people are never parties litigant. Again, no State shall—

"Be formed by the junction of two or more States or parts of States without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress."—Art. 4, sec. 3.

Here the geographical State and population are denominated the State, since the corporate State cannot be divided into parts.

Again:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."—Art. 4, sec. 4.

Here, again, the geographical State and people are recognized as the State even without government, since that is to be guarantied to the State. The Constitution is full of similar examples. The distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] though maintaining with plausible skill the unimpaired rights of the States, admits the distinction I have drawn by conceding that "a State" does not "consist of its form of government," but of "the people," to which he adds, rather in apposition than with legal accuracy, "the body-politic." Now, over these States, and over each element of them, as well as elsewhere, the national Government has certain executive, legislative, and judicial powers, sovereign powers, the exercise of which may by force be suspended, leaving the right unimpaired, with a unity of government, of territory, and of population indestructible.

CONDITION AND RIGHTS OF REBEL STATES.

No State in its geographical sense, therefore, has in legal contemplation ever been out of the Union, or dead. The people were never absolved from the duty of allegiance, nor the nation deprived of its rights of sovereignty and jurisdiction, though their exercise was interrupted in fact. No State ever became a mere territory, or could be governed as such, since the people and geographical State survived, entitled to the guarantee of State government so soon as Congress might deem practicable, or to military or civil provisional government as a means to that end, (4 Wheat., 316; 12 Coke, 130-338; 2 Bishop, Cr. L.,) and no change could be made in State boundaries except in the mode prescribed in the Constitution.

The constitutional ties which bound the geographical States and people in the Union were never sundered in the eye of the law, and they therefore continued to owe to the national Government every constitutional duty, though they in fact rendered none. Their State constitutions and laws remained in force to preserve every right of person and property, except such as were changed by the war, but with no means of enforcing them, and incapable of securing the exercise of any political right when all title to office ceased with no authorized mode of resuming it.

PRACTICAL IMPORTANCE OF THE QUESTIONS.

We have been told that these are "metaphysical questions of no importance." I maintain that they involve vital principles of constitutional law more deeply affecting the character of the Government and the prerogatives and interests of the people than any which have arisen in our history.

If by rebellion and flagrant war the States incur all the penalties of war, subject to reconstruction by national authority, or if when State government is abandoned or destroyed, the Congress may interfere to guaranty it, then is the power of the people complete to preserve the national life, and prescribe the means and the terms and the time necessary therefor. (Wells ex parte, 18 Howard.) But if the power of reconstruction reverts to the States or their people, with no forms of law to guide them, and with no restraints; if they may at once without terms, or guarantees, or even loyalty of purpose, resume governments they have repudiated, contemned, despised, abandoned, and overthrown, or create new ones, the result will be only to transfer treason in arms to traitors in the councils of the State, and the nation, retaining the uncontrolled power to oppress all who have been faithful, and finally to destroy the nation itself.

If it is the unquestioned right of the President alone, without the authority or ratification of Congress, to set up State governments, then a result will follow which the President never intended—that South Carolina and all the rebel States, the moment when war in legal fact ceases, will, as a matter of absolute right, and without question, be entitled to have Senators and Representatives who can take the oath of office, at once admitted to Congress, no matter how disloyal and hostile and illy prepared to maintain State government may be the people. It is fearful to contemplate a power which in hands less faithful than those of our now respected Chief Magistrate, might be employed to perpetuate his own indefinite sway. Vast powers unrestrained in the hands of any one man are incompatible with republican government.

I speak in behalf of the majesty of the people, of the supremacy of their power through their Representatives in Congress, and in their name, and in the name of the Constitution and of the sainted dead who made and construed it, I demand that in our own good time and way, the Congress, "the United States, shall guaranty to each State" "a republican form of government." In the exercise of this high power I demand that if there may be no indemnity for the past there may be some terms, some security, at least the security of loyalty, for the future. (1 Black, 436-474; 5 Elliot's Debates, 492, August 29, 1787; 3 Howard, 589; 4 Wheaton, 316.)

NO REPRESENTATIVES OR PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS IF NO STATE GOVERNMENT.

But if there be no State government, then the right of representation in Congress and the Electoral College does not exist. The Constitution declares that in the election of Representatives—

"The electors in each State shall have the qualification requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature."

If there be no State government there can be no electors, no Legislature, and without the sanction of Congress no Representatives in Congress. If there be no Legislature there can be no Senators. And as presidential electors are to be appointed "in such manner as the Legislature may direct," there can be no electors if there be no legislative power and no authorized officers to hold elections.

TWO GROUNDS UPON WHICH STATE GOVERNMENT LOST.

There are two grounds upon which the nation may treat the rebel States as without any civil

State government: first, as against traitors and traitor government, by the military right of the conqueror; second, because in fact all lawful State government has been abandoned and forfeited by universal rebellion, and all rebel government has been destroyed.

THE RIGHTS OF THE VICTOR IN WAR.

And first as to the rights of the victor in war. It has already been settled that "in organizing this rebellion" the States "have acted as States." (2 Black, 673; 3 Dallas, 93.)

And further, that—

"The civil war between the United States and the so-called confederate States had such character and magnitude as to give the United States the same rights and powers which they might exercise in case of a foreign war."—2 Black, 635.

Every reason of this rule makes it applicable to local as well as to foreign government. The war power in civil as well as foreign war is limited only by necessity or the Constitution; and these alike unite in clothing the nation with all the powers of a conqueror. And this is so because the Constitution recognizes the laws of nations as a part of the law of the land. (Attorney General's opinion, July, 1865.) Yet who will say that a conquest by foreign war does not give the victor the right in the exercise of civil power to create new civil government and to overturn that which exists? (United States vs. Percheman, 7 Peters, 86; Boston Law Reporter, June, 1862, page 498.)

This right was asserted in our territorial conquests from Mexico, was affirmed by the Supreme Court, and was employed by the President when he dissolved rebel legislatures, prohibited their reassemblage, drove out of office all rebel officers, and set up provisional military governments over most of the States. (Cross vs. Harrison, 16 Howard, 194.) This right is asserted by all the writers on international law as between international States. Grotius says:

"Livius tells us that the Romans were willing that Capua should be inhabited as a town but that there should be no corporation, no senate, no common council, no magistrates, no jurisdiction but a dependent multitude, and that a governor should be sent from Rome to dispense justice among them; and therefore Cicero, in his first oration to the people against Tullius, says that Capua had not so much as the shadow of a State left. The same may be said of those reduced into the form of a province, and of them who are subjected to another people, as Byzantium was to Perinthus by the Emperor Severus, and Antioch to Laodicea by Theodosius."—Grotius, 265; 2 Macaulay Eng., 624.

And as applied to the rebel States, it exists qualified by the duty of the nation to guaranty State governments. Let me be understood; I do not apply this right to lawful State governments.

HISTORICAL SUMMARY.

But lawful civil State government does not exist in the rebel States upon other grounds.

In the years 1860 and 1861 eleven of the States adopted ordinances of secession. Each for itself set up in form, but not in legal fact, a new government, claiming to be an independent sovereign nationality. They united and formed a confederacy known as the confederate States. The States, the confederacy, and their people made war on the United States and waged it for four years. When conquered by our arms, the rebel State and confederate governments were dissolved, their officers dispersed, their assumed authority terminated. The President, by virtue of his undoubted military power, set up in most of these States a military provisional government, with each its military governor. (16 Howard, 194.) But the President went further. By proclamations, without any law of Congress, he required these governors severally to assemble conventions to create State constitutions, to provide for elections; and new State governments supplanting the military have been set up and now exist, purporting to be civil in form. But peace is not yet declared. A state of war exists. (Attorney General's Letter, January 4.)

REBEL STATE GOVERNMENTS NOT RECOGNIZED.

The rebel State governments have been overthrown and no State asserts any right under them. The war power in fact destroyed them.

As they were not republican in form in the sense of our Constitution, Congress might have interposed to overthrow them if the civil power could have accomplished it. The belligerent rights accorded to them did not "concede that they formed a State or that they were de facto such. There is a difference between belligerents and belligerent States." (President Woolsey, Yale College, International Law, 231.)

OTHER GOVERNMENTS NOT EXISTING.

If, therefore, there be any valid civil State government it must be because the State governments in force when the secession ordinances were adopted either—

1. Continued to be and are governments; or,
2. Were suspended by rebellion and are restored; or,
3. That new governments have been lawfully set in operation.

All of which I deny.

LOYAL GOVERNMENT ABANDONED.

And first, did those governments continue? That State constitutions might provide a mode of resuming government after all its functions have ceased might possibly be conceded. That no one has done so is certain.

During the four years of rebellion every function of these governments ceased, every duty was repudiated, every office was abandoned, every term of office had expired, there was no claimant or anyone entitled to hold any office, and no law provided any mode of electing or authenticating the election of any. If government can be abandoned, abdicated, or destroyed by war; if the corporate State may be dissolved, as may a private or municipal corporation, by any means; if the constitution, as its charter, may be incapable of operating for want of officers to constitute government, then did these governments cease. (Glover on Municipal Corporations, 408; Stat. 2 W. & M., c. 8.)

And that they may do so, and did so, I affirm on the authority of the Constitution, of the laws of nations, of Madison, of the Supreme Court, of the lamented Lincoln, and of President Johnson.

The Constitution declares that—"The United States shall guaranty to every State" * * * "a republican form of government."—Art. 4, sec. 4.

This implies that a State may abandon all government, else why talk about guarantying government to a State if it could not cease to have one?

The Declaration of Independence affirms of George III, that—"He has abdicated government here by declaring us out of his protection and waging war against us."

The rebel States declared themselves out of our protection and waged war against us.

Grotius, that highest source of international law, says:

"Sovereignty" * * * "may cease by being abandoned and deserted."

He adds:

"Isocrates, and after him the Emperor Julian, said that States were immortal; that is, they may possibly prove so." * * * "The frame and constitution of the body is dissolved and broken when the subjects either of their own accord are disunited on the account of a pestilence or a sedition, or are by force so scattered as that they cannot more reunite, which often happens in war."—War and Peace, 265.

Mr. Madison says of article four, section four, of the Constitution, its object was to authorize "Federal interposition" when there is employed "force to subvert the Government," that "the authority extends" to a case where there has been "a preëxisting government;" that to deny the power of "interference in the domestic concerns of the members" of the Union, "against changes to be effected by violence, usurpation, sedition," would "deprive us of one of the principal advantages of Union." (Federalist 21, 43.)

If a new State should—

"be formed by the junction of two or more States," as the Constitution authorizes, where would be the old corporate States, the governments? Overthrown, destroyed.

In Luther vs. Borden, 7 Howard, 42, Judge Taney says:

"Undoubtedly a military government, established as the permanent government of a State, would not be a republican government, and it would be the duty of Congress to overthrow it."

If the power should be exercised, would not the government cease?

In the amnesty proclamation of December 8, 1863, President Lincoln, distinguishing with great accuracy between the condition of national and State authority, says:

"The national authority has been suspended, and loyal State governments have been subverted;" and "have for a long time been subverted."

And in his message he suggests a plan by which new State governments may be "set up."

On the 18th of March, 1862, Andrew Johnson, in an address to the people of Tennessee, said:

"I find most if not all of the offices, both State and Federal, vacated, either by actual abandonment or by the action of the incumbents in attempting to subordinate their functions to a power in hostility to the fundamental law of the State and subversive of her national allegiance."

The President, in his several proclamations of 1865 appointing military provisional governors for the rebel States, declares that—

"The rebellion has in its revolutionary progress deprived the people of the State of all civil government."

And provisional governors were appointed, say the proclamations—

"For the purpose of enabling the loyal people of the [geographical] State to organize a [new] State government."

And the object is declared to be—

"To present [to Congress] such a republican form of State government as will entitle the [geographical] State to the guarantee of the United States therefor."

And so the people of the South have understood their condition ever since the surrender of their last army, on the 26th of May, 1865.

On the 15th July, 1865, James Johnson, in accepting the office of provisional governor, said to the people:

"According to the proclamation of the President, we, as Georgians, stand to-day without any civil government. We have no Governor, no Legislature, no judges, no inferior magistrates. This has been the result of the rebellion. It has deprived us of all the machinery necessary to carry on a civil government."

It was because these geographical States "had no Governor, no Legislature, no judges, no inferior magistrates"—no government, and no mode known to their constitution or laws of restoring any, that the President interfered. If such a "dependent multitude," incapable of exercising any function of State government or discharging any one national duty which depended on State government; if these constitute government, from such good Lord deliver us!

The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] admits, upon the authority of Wheaton and Grotius and Burlamaqui, that—"Habitual obedience to law is essential to the existence of a State" government.

If rebel government preserved the identity of the State, yet this was overthrown, and obedience ceased both to loyal and usurped government, and therefore all State government ceased.

And this has been solemnly decided by Congress by declaring that a majority of the Senators and Representatives from the loyal States should constitute a quorum, and that the loyal States alone had the right to elect a President and Vice President. The very title under which the President now holds his office, and the authority by which laws are made here, constantly admonish us that the geographical States of the South have ceased to have governments or the right to a voice in electing a President or Senators or Representatives. (Joint Resolution Congress, February 8, 1865, Laws 1865, p. 568.)

LOYAL GOVERNMENTS NOT RESUMED.

But could the original loyal State governments be resumed? It has been sufficiently shown that they were destroyed, not suspended merely, and therefore could not be resumed.

If they could be resumed it must be in obedience to some law, or under the war power of the President, or because the right to do so was inherent in and reverted to the people.

But no law provided the means or a mode of resuming abandoned constitutions and government. No man can point to any provision of any constitution or law authorizing this.

The war power may set up military or provisional but not permanent civil government, for this is the exercise of a civil power. (Cross vs. Harrison, 16 Howard, 194; Federalist, No. 69, 85.)

The power to "execute the laws" does not authorize the President to do this, for there are no laws of the United States for this purpose to be executed. The power to guaranty government is granted, not to the President, but to the United States. If the President may lawfully do this, his decision would be final; but in our system "Congress must decide what government is established." (7 Howard, 42.)

The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] declares that—

"We ought to accept the present status of the southern States, and regard them as having resumed, under the President's guidance and action, the functions of self-government in the Union."—Speech, 29th January.

And he quotes these passages from Wheaton to sustain him:

"But whatever be its internal constitution or form of government, or whoever may be its rulers, or even if it be distracted with anarchy, through a violent contest for the Government between different parties among the people, the State still subsists in contemplation of law until its sovereignty is completely extinguished by the final dissolution of the social tie, or by some other cause which puts an end to the being of the State." * * *

"The habitual obedience of the members of any political society to a superior authority must have once existed in order to constitute a sovereign State. But the temporary suspension of that obedience and of that authority, in consequence of a civil war, does not necessarily extinguish the being of a State, although it may affect for a time its ordinary relations with other States." * * *

And he proceeds to argue that "the coalition which attempted to restore order and the Bourbons to France," after the "great contest of the French Revolution," held "that France had [never] ceased to be a State;" that although in Mexico "sovereignty resides in" Maximilian "who holds its capital, its archives, and its laws," yet "when Juarez comes back to take possession of the Government" it will still survive.

I am free to concede that it is true of England, of France, of Mexico, and of our own nation, that the temporary overthrow of supreme national government will not destroy the Constitution or the right to resume it. And this is so upon two grounds: either because a rightful title to office survives in lawful officers who can resume the constitutional exercise of Government, or because when this is not so sovereignty reverts to the people and may be resumed by them in the constitutional forms, or by their own act if no such forms are prescribed.

The constitution of England, in essential features, was suspended during the reign of Cromwell, which interrupted but did not destroy the hereditary title of Charles II to the crown, to resume the exercise of sovereignty.

The same principle applies to all Governments with hereditary sovereigns.

In our own national Government the Constitution or Government cannot perish, because while a sufficient number of the States survives the means are provided of periodically supplying the executive and legislative branches of the Government with the appropriate officers to execute their duties, or if all this should fail sovereignty would revert to the people to be by them resumed under a constitution on its face of perpetual obligation and retaining vitality ex proprio vigore.

This principle is recognized in Grotius, who says:

"In an elective Government if the King or royal family (or President and Congress) should become extinct, the right of sovereignty would revert to the people."—1 Cumbell's Grotius, 336, chap. 9.

And this is necessarily so, since there is no superior power authorized to guaranty government.

But these, or European analogies can furnish no rule of international or constitutional law for States in our system. A State of the Union is not a nation in the sense of international law. The nation alone is recognized among the States of the world. And in the States, when all title to office has ceased and no mode of supplying any is authorized, it becomes the duty of Congress to guaranty government.

This cannot be done by the people without law, for if so, conflicting and hostile governments might be set up as numerous as the political parties or conventions that might assemble for that purpose, and discord would reign supreme.

The power of reconstruction or sovereignty did not revert to the people of the States, because the Constitution declares that no powers "are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people," which are

"delegated to the United States."—Art. 10, Amendments.

And the power of reconstruction is delegated to Congress in these words of the Constitution:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."—Art. 4, sec. 4.

And as Bishop very justly observes:

"A State which has no government has not a republican form of government."—2 Criminal Law, section 1224, note.

This power is wisely delegated to Congress, because it is essential to the national life. If left to the States they might forever decline to exercise it under the promptings of the same spirit that would induce rebellion. The very occasion which would create the necessity to organize new State government would prove that the duty to do so could not be intrusted to those unwilling to maintain government.

In this respect a State of this Union is less in power than an international State. And in addition to this the power of reconstruction is a national power, not only inherent in the right of existence, with the incidental power to perpetuate it, but as an incident to the right of the continued exercise of every power of the national Government.

Unless we concede that the nation may lawfully die, we must maintain its power to employ all the means necessary to its continued existence.

THE PRESIDENT SANCTIONS THIS VIEW.

And the President in his proclamations treated the old constitutions like other corporate charters, as having ceased to constitute or be capable of constituting government:

1. By himself calling conventions to create new constitutions, thus denying that sovereignty had reverted to the people or that State constitutions as charters of government were in force.

2. By requiring delegates to conventions to be elected by citizens "loyal to the United States and none others," whereas the State constitutions made all male adult white citizens voters.

3. By requiring that "no person shall be qualified as an elector or shall be eligible as a member of such convention unless he shall have previously taken and subscribed the oath of amnesty," whereas the State constitutions required no such tests. (See act of February 25, 1865, 13 United States Statutes, 437.)

4. By requiring new constitutions to be made at times and in a manner unauthorized by the old ones.

5. By invoking, as in the proclamations he did, not the military, but the civil power of the Constitution "to guaranty" State governments as the authority for all this.

If the old constitutions were alive these things could not be done. They were alive in all things or dead in all things as charters of government. If dead as to the qualification of electors and the mode of amending, they were dead for all purposes of constituting government.

Let me illustrate this by an example. The constitution of South Carolina in force when the rebellion commenced provides that—

"No part of the constitution shall be altered unless a bill to alter the same shall have been read three times in the House of Representatives and three times in the Senate, and agreed to by two thirds of both branches of the whole representation."

Yet a new constitution has been created for South Carolina and other rebel States in a manner wholly unknown to their constitutions or laws. The governments, then, which have been set up are new creations.

Provisional Governor Johnson, in the same address to which I have alluded, declared this in these words:

"Under this state of facts I have been appointed by the President provisional governor of Georgia. All the power which I can exercise over you in this office is derived by virtue of my appointment from him. I have not been elected Governor under the laws of Georgia, nor by the sovereign people of Georgia. I have not been appointed for the purpose of establishing government, administering government; but appointed, as the proclamation declares, for one single purpose, and that is to enable the people of Georgia to form a government."

that is, to create a new government.

It may be said these conventions amended the old constitutions. They set up new governments, as much so as the rebel confederacy which amended and adopted our national Constitution as the Magna Charta of a new government, a new creation, a new-born nation, that fortunately died before its birth was complete.

NEW GOVERNMENTS HAVE NOT YET BEEN LAWFULLY CREATED.

The same argument which proves that neither the President nor the people of the States could lawfully set in motion suspended State government as in abeyance, equally disproves the power of either to create new State governments. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] practically concedes this. His language is:

"He [the President] then appointed provisional governors by virtue of his authority as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, under whose direction and guidance, as representatives of the national authority, this process of restoration might proceed."

"Now, I know the question has been raised—and perhaps it is not quite clear and free from doubt—as to the precise legal authority he had to take this specific step."—Speech, January 23.

And my colleague [Mr. HUBBELL] says:

"I claim the right and power of Congress to review what has been done in the restoration of civil governments in the rebel States."

"There are irregularities in this plan."—Speech, February 5.

I am not now objecting to the measures taken by the President for reconstruction, for he has not yet denied the power of Congress to make laws authorizing the creation of new governments, nor has he asserted that the existing governments will be valid without congressional ratification. The people of California without authority organized State government, and it only became valid when ratified by Congress, and this is the condition of Colorado now.

The highest court has finally and forever settled this power of Congress to guaranty government and determine what one lawfully exists in a State by saying:

"It rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State." * * *

"And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority, and its decision is binding on every other department of the Government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal."—1 Calhoun's Works, 332.

That the whole policy of reconstruction was in view of these principles and dependent for validity on the action of Congress is manifest, not only because it is not to be presumed that the President designed to transcend the Constitution, but because he has declared his reconstruction scheme to be an "experiment" only, and has in his message referred to Congress the question whether Senators and Representatives shall be admitted. If it had the effect of absolute law it could not be an experiment, and if the right of representation was absolute it could not be referred to Congress for the exercise of discretion.

In the report of General Schurz to the President, it is said:

"You informed me that your 'policy of reconstruction' was merely experimental, and that you would change it if the experiment did not lead to satisfactory results."—Sent to Congress December 19.

If the President may abandon the "experiment" may not Congress do the same?

The message concedes congressional ratification to be necessary, by saying that this "policy implies an invitation to those States" "to resume their functions," which can only be done under the power to guaranty government. If the corporate States survived, or awoke from abeyance, or if "sovereignty reverted to the people," neither executive or congressional power could interfere. The obligation to guaranty republican government is not to restore or preserve the original State government, but "a republican form of government"—one in the discretion of Congress; a new proof that the original corporate State may forfeit existence. (Madison Papers, 723, 734, 794, 844, 838, 861, 913, 1139, 1241.)

LINCOLN'S POLICY OF RECONSTRUCTION.

There can therefore be no valid de jure reorganized civil State government unless previously authorized by Congress or now ratified by it.

This is precisely the doctrine of President Lincoln and the Congress which ratified the new government created for Virginia in 1861. Governor Peirpoint, of Virginia, in his message of June 20, 1865, affirms in effect that the lawful government of Virginia was abandoned and destroyed by the rebellion; that the loyal people set up a new government without presidential intervention; but that it was unauthorized until ratified by Congress under the power to guaranty State government. His language is:

"I shall not here enter into a discussion of the causes of secession, but will state some of the political results of that act, and in doing so I shall quote freely from one of my former messages.

"In April, 1861, the State convention passed what was called an ordinance of secession, pretending to absolve the people of the State from the duties and obligations of citizens of the United States and thereby destroy our nationality. They attempted to transfer the allegiance of the people to a pretended foreign nation. This action was opposed by the loyal men of the State as unlawful and revolutionary, holding that the Constitution of the United States was adopted by the people of the United States and could only be altered or amended by them, acting in conformity with its own provisions for its amendment or alteration.

"The executive officers of the State having joined the insurrectionists, the loyal people of the State were thrown upon their original rights as citizens of the State and of the United States. They called a convention, composed of the members elected to the General Assembly, on the fourth Thursday of May, 1861, and, in addition thereto, doubled the number of delegates that each county was entitled to in the popular branch of the Legislature. The capital of the State being in the hands of the insurgents, the convention assembled at Wheeling, on the 11th day of June, 1861, to take into consideration what was best to be done for Virginia.

"Among the first ordinances which they passed was one to declare the offices of Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and attorney general vacant on account of the incumbents of said offices having taken an oath to support what they deemed a foreign government; and the convention proceeded to elect officers to fill their places for the term of six months, and until the loyal people of the State, by order of the General Assembly, should elect their successors.

"The Governor thus elected immediately notified the President of the United States of the domestic violence existing in the State, and of his inability to suppress it, and called for military assistance, in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

"To this call the President of the United States, through his Secretary of War, responded, both by promising and sending military aid, also expressing his knowledge of the acts and purposes of the confederation. The Executive of the State, thus recognized, immediately called together the General Assembly of the State. Messrs. Hunter and Mason, the United States Senators from Virginia, having also joined in the rebellion, the Legislature thus called proceeded to elect two United States Senators to fill their places. The Senators thus elected were admitted to seats in the United States Senate.

"The Wheeling convention made but a single alteration in the constitution of the State, which was to reduce the number of members in each House of the General Assembly necessary to constitute a quorum to do business. They directed that the seat of government should be for the time being at Wheeling. Before the State was divided, the Legislature passed an act directing the Executive, upon the organization of the new State of West Virginia, to establish the seat of government within the State at such place as he might deem fit. I chose Alexandria.

"The authority for this proceeding is derived from the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States, which is as follows:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and, on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence."

This clause was inserted in the Federal Constitution to protect the minority, or the party weaker in available strength. Mr. Madison, in the Federalist, speaking of this clause, says:

"At first view it might seem not to square with the republican theory to suppose either that the majority have not the right or that a minority will have the force to subvert the government, and consequently that the Federal interposition can never be required but when it would be improper. But theoretic reasoning in this, as in most other cases, must be qualified by lessons of practice. Why may not illicit combinations for purposes of violence be formed as well by a majority of a State, especially a small State, as by a majority of a county or a district of the same State?"

"Among the advantages of a confederate republic enumerated by Montesquieu, an important one is, that should popular insurrection happen in one of the States, the others are able to quell it. Should abuses creep into one part, they are reformed by those that remain sound."

The great name of Lincoln has been invoked to sanction the power of reconstruction under presidential proclamation.

He did, indeed, by his amnesty proclamation of 1863 propose a plan for the creation of new governments.

But of this I remark:

1. This was done flagrante bello, as a war measure, to induce the people to abandon rebellion. The same reason does not exist now.

2. He did not maintain that governments could be set up without the authority or ratification of Congress, for his amnesty proclamation says:

"Whether members sent to Congress from any State shall be admitted to seats, constitutionally rests exclusively with the respective Houses, and not to any extent with the Executive."

And Congress refused to admit Senators and Representatives sent from Louisiana and Arkansas as reorganized sub modo under President Lincoln's proclamation of 1863.

3. He admitted the power of Congress, and as there could not be two absolute powers conceded he had none to create civil State government.

And President Johnson in his message admits the same thing, saying:

"In case of the usurpation of the government of a State by one man or an oligarchy, it becomes a duty of the United States to make good the guarantee to that State of a republican form of government."

In his proclamation of July 8, 1864, President Lincoln said:

"I am unprepared" * * * * "to be inflexibly committed to any single plan of restoration."

And referring to the bill passed by Congress authorizing the appointment of provisional governors to be charged with the administration of civil government until a State government therein shall be reorganized as therein provided, but which failed to become a law for want of his approval, he says:

"I am fully satisfied with the system for restoration contained in the bill as one very proper plan for the loyal people of any State choosing to adopt it, and that I am and at all times shall be prepared to give the executive aid and assistance to any such people," &c.

And in his speech of April 11, 1865, he speaks of "the new State governments" to be organized in these States.

4. He declared himself in favor of "constitutional conditions" as a right of the victor, and one inherent in the nation, and he affirmed that the idea of revived State government "was simply absurd." He recognized the right of imposing terms, a power already exercised when Missouri and West Virginia were admitted into the Union. (3 Howard, 609; 5 Elliot's Debates, 492.)

In his message of December 8, 1863, he says:

"It is also proffered that if in any of the States named a State government shall be in the mode prescribed set up, such government shall be recognized and guaranteed by the United States, and that under it the State shall on constitutional conditions be protected against invasion and domestic violence."

"An attempt to guaranty and protect a revived State government constructed in whole or in preponderating part from the very element against whose hostility it is to be protected is simply absurd."

STATE GOVERNMENTS NOT YET RECOGNIZED IN REBEL STATES.

But we are told that Congress has apportioned Representatives and direct taxes to all the States, that national courts are held, post offices established, and revenues collected; and thus all the States have been recognized. I do not doubt the continued existence of the geographical States, but if it be said that State governments have been recognized, I deny it.

We hold national courts, collect revenues, and appoint postmasters in Territories, but they do not thereby become clothed with State governments. The existence of a State government is not necessary for any of these purposes.

Representatives and direct taxes were apportioned before the present State governments were set up, and they are not therefore recognized. (Act of March 4, 1862, and August 5, 1861.)

If this argument proves anything it proves too much. It would prove that the rebel State government of South Carolina was a valid State government of the Union, for that was the only State government exercising jurisdiction when these acts were passed.

If Congress should even declare that a State government existed when none in fact did, that would not make it so. These acts only fixed the number of Representatives and the amount of taxes apportioned to each geographical State in anticipation of the reestablishment of State government.

But it is said the Secretary of State is required by law to make publication of constitutional amendments when "officially notified" of their ratification by States, and that having done so as to the amendment abolishing slavery, certain State governments are thereby recognized. But his proclamation that he is "officially notified" when there is no valid State government to notify him, cannot change the fact. He is not clothed with power to recognize State governments, for that rests with Congress.

But we are gravely informed that the President has recognized the existing State governments as valid, and that his decision is "final and conclusive" and "could not be reviewed or reversed by any authority whatever."

We are not told by what acts they have been so recognized, but the message itself denies this by referring to Congress the question of admitting Senators and Representatives. In the Dorr rebellion case, (7 Howard,) the court said that as Congress had by law made it the duty of the President to suppress insurrection in a case of two conflicting State governments, "he must of necessity decide which is the government."

No such case has arisen for any decision of the President as to existing governments in the rebel States. But if so, the court did not declare that his decision would be "final and conclusive" on the Government of the United States. On the contrary, the court did say, "It rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State."

And if the power may be transferred to the President, may it not be withdrawn?

The power is not treated as an original constitutional power of the President, for the court say that Congress, "if they had deemed it most advisable to do so, might have placed it in the power of a court to decide," instead of the President.

Congress is the source of original power, and no derivative authority can be final and conclusive against the Government. A power which for the time being might be conclusive, as between conflicting State governments or on the courts, is not conclusive on the nation.

This concession of "final and conclusive" power to any one man is a surrender of the Constitution itself. What security is there against the abuse of this power? States may be made and unmade by the will of one man; and we are told his decision is "final and conclusive."

If President Buchanan, in December, 1860, had recognized the rebel government of South Carolina as valid, would it be true that this—"Was a final and conclusive decision in favor of that government, and such a decision as could not be reviewed or reversed by any authority whatever?"—Globe, February 15.

If it be replied that he could not recognize an unauthorized government, I answer, that is a petitio principii—the present State governments in the rebel States are also unauthorized.

HOW GOVERNMENT MAY BE ESTABLISHED.

Since all lawful civil State government has been subverted, the inquiry necessarily arises as to how and when it may be established. The mode is a question of constitutional law; the time is a question of constitutional duty and practicability.

That the power rests with Congress has been sufficiently shown. This power may be exercised by ratifying the present unauthorized governments, (2 Black, 671,) or by an enabling act, as proposed by the Congress of 1864, prescribing a mode of setting up State governments through authorized conventions of the people. Until this shall be practicable, government, as a means to that end, in the discretion of Congress, may be established, since—

"If the end be legitimate, all the means which are appropriate and not prohibited may constitutionally be employed to carry it into effect."—4 Wheaton, 316; 3 Howard, 609; 5 Elliot's Debates, 492; Martin vs. Hunter, 1 Wheaton, 325.

And Chief Justice Taney says:

"It rested with Congress to determine the means proper to be adopted to fulfill this guarantee."—7 Howard.

For this purpose the present governments may be accepted as provisional, or new ones created in their stead; and because these are grave questions, the whole subject has been referred to the joint committee of fifteen on reconstruction in order that we may be enlightened by their labors, and then decide.

DANGERS OF HASTY RECONSTRUCTION.

Let us pause before we validate and clothe with national power State governments created at the point of the bayonet, grudgingly approved by inconsiderable minorities, and held together by the sword of the nation.

The Governor of Mississippi says "Under the pressure of Federal bayonets the people have abolished slavery" and organized government. (Message, November 20.)

The military governor, Perry, of South Carolina, declared the convention assembled under the President's proclamation, "a revolutionary body." (Letter to Governor Orr, December 9, 1865.)

Let us inquire if local government intrusted to loyal men, under congressional law in some, perhaps most, of the rebel States, until military power shall be unnecessary, will not sooner bring permanent State governments with safety to all, than the hazardous "experiment" of turning over to infuriate rebels the loyal population and the freedmen, before time or adequate guarantees give assurance of its success.

Let us pause before we intrust with power in these Halls, to govern us, a people who are properly held by the President in military subjection, because they are unprepared to govern themselves, or soon that national death which could not be achieved in the field may be accomplished in the Capitol by conspirators,

"Whose treason like a deadly blight
Comes o'er the counsels of the brave
And blasts them in their hour of might."

The writ of habeas corpus remains suspended, while our military forces and commanders occupy every rebel State, and with the Freedmen's Bureau control the exercise of local jurisdiction, and set aside State laws and State elections at pleasure. I have unflinching confidence in the President, but let us pause before we make precedents for successors less worthy. If executive military power can make and unmake State governments, and at the point of the bayonet send Representatives to Congress and fill the Electoral College, we may live to see in them the reflected will of a military dictator and the end of the Republic. The President cannot desire this. Will it not rather be time enough to clothe rebels with political power, when they are prepared to do justice without national military constraint?

A State government created and controlled by national military power is after all in fact and legal effect but a military government under another name. (Cross vs. Harrison, 16 Howard, 194.)

I do not condemn the exercise of this military power. The disloyal condition of the people renders it necessary. The necessity for its exercise is shown by military orders sanctioned by the President. Permit me to read some of them. Here is one:

[General Orders, No. 4.]

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF VIRGINIA,
RICHMOND, VA., January 24, 1866.

By a statute law passed at the present session of the Legislature of Virginia, entitled "A bill providing for the punishment of vagrants," it is enacted, among other things, that any justice of the peace, upon the complaint of any one of certain officers therein named, may issue his warrant for the apprehension of any person alleged to be a vagrant, and cause such person to be apprehended and brought before him; and that if, upon due examination, said justice of the peace shall find that such person is a vagrant within the definition of vagrancy contained in said statute he shall issue his warrant directing such person to be employed for a term not exceeding three months, and by any constable of the county wherein the proceedings are had, be hired out for the best wages that can be procured, his wages to be applied to the support of himself and his family.

The said statute further provides, that in case any vagrant so hired shall during his term of service run away from his employer without sufficient cause, he shall be apprehended on the warrant of a justice of the peace, and returned to the custody of his employer, who shall then have, free of any further hire, the services of such vagrant for one month, in addition to the original term of hiring; and that the employer shall then have power, if authorized by a justice of the peace, to work such vagrant with ball and chain.

The said statute specifies the persons who shall be considered vagrants and be liable to the penalties imposed by it. Among those declared to be vagrants are "all persons who, not having the wherewith to support their families, live idly and without employment, and refuse to work for the usual and common wages given to other laborers, in the like work, in the place where they then are."

In many counties of this State, meetings of employers had been held, and unjust and wrongful combinations have been entered into for the purpose of depressing the wages of the freedmen below the real value of their labor, far below the prices formerly paid to masters for labor performed by their slaves.

By reason of these combinations, wages utterly inadequate to the support of themselves and their families have, in many places, become the usual and common wages of the freedmen.

The effect of the statute in question will be, therefore, to compel the freedmen, under penalty of punishment as criminals, to accept and labor for the wages established by these combinations of employers. It places them wholly in the power of their employers, and it is easy to foresee that, even where no such combinations now exist, the temptation to form them, offered by the statute, will be too strong to be resisted, and that such inadequate wages will become the common and usual wages throughout the State.

The ultimate effect of the statute will be to reduce the freedmen to a condition of servitude worse than that from which they have been emancipated—a condition which will be slavery in all but its name.

It is, therefore, ordered that no magistrate, civil officer, or other person, shall in any way or manner apply, or attempt to apply, the provision of said statute to any colored person in this department.

By command of Major General Terry:

EDWARD W. SMITH,

Assistant Adjutant General.

And I find it said:

"The withdrawal of the military from the interior of the State has opened the floods of rancor toward loyal men and negroes, and already cases of unprovoked abuse and unseemly horror have been reported to these headquarters. In order to properly check this alarming evil, General Terry has found it necessary, as follows, to clothe the officers of the Freedmen's Bureau with extraordinary power:

[General Orders, No. 5.]

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF VIRGINIA,
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, January 24, 1866.

All officers in the military service in this department, acting as superintendents or assistant superintendents of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, &c., are hereby invested with all the power and authority usually exercised by provost marshals.

By command of Major General A. H. Terry:

EDWARD W. SMITH,

Assistant Adjutant General."

And in South Carolina, General Sickles has found it necessary to protect the freedmen by similar orders. Here is one:

[General Orders, No. 1.]

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT SOUTH CAROLINA,
CHARLESTON, January 17, 1866.

I. To the end that civil rights and immanities may be enjoyed; that kindly relations among the inhabitants of the State may be established; that the rights and duties of the employer and the free laborer respectively may be defined; that the soil may be cultivated and the system of free labor fairly undertaken; that the owners of estates may be secure in the possession of their lands and tenements; that persons, able and willing to work, may have employment; that idleness and vagrancy may be discountenanced, and encouragement given to industry and thrift; and that humane provision may be made for the aged, infirm, and destitute, the following regulations are established for the government of all concerned in this department:

II. All laws shall be applicable alike to all the inhabitants. No person shall be held incompetent to sue, make complaint, or to testify, because of color or caste.

III. All the employments of husbandry or the useful arts, and all lawful, trades or callings may be followed by all persons irrespective of color or caste; nor shall any freedman be obliged to pay any tax or any fee for a license, nor be amenable to any municipal or parish ordinance, not imposed upon all other persons.

IV. The lawful industry of all persons who live under the protection of the United States, and owe obedience to its laws, being useful to the individual, and essential to the welfare of society, no person will be restrained from seeking employment when not bound by voluntary agreement, nor hindered from traveling from place to place, on lawful business. All combinations or agreements which are intended to hinder, or may so operate as to hinder, in any way, the employment of labor—or to limit compensation for labor—or to compel labor to be involuntarily performed in certain places or for certain persons; as well as all combinations or agreements to prevent the sale or hire of lands or tenements, are declared to be misdemeanors; and any person or persons convicted thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment, not to exceed six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

V. Agreements for labor or personal service of any kind, or for the use and occupation of lands and tenements, or for any other lawful purpose, between freedmen and other persons, when fairly made, will be impartially enforced against either party violating the same.

VI. Freed persons unable to labor, by reason of age, or infirmity, and orphan children of tender years, shall have allotted to them by owners suitable quarters on the premises where they have been heretofore domiciled as slaves, until adequate provision, approved by the general commanding, be made for them by the State or local authorities, or otherwise; and they shall not be removed from the premises, unless for disorderly behavior, misdemeanor, or other offense committed by the head of a family or a member thereof.

VII. Able-bodied freedmen, when they leave the premises in which they may be domiciled, shall take with them and provide for such of their relatives as by the laws of South Carolina all citizens are obliged to maintain.

VIII. When a freed person, domiciled on a plantation, refuses to work there, after having been offered employment by the owner or lessee on fair terms, approved by the agent of the Freedmen's Bureau, such freedman or woman shall remove from the premises within ten days after such offer, and due notice to remove by the owner or occupant.

IX. When able-bodied freed persons are domiciled on premises where they have been heretofore held as slaves, and are not employed thereon or elsewhere, they shall be permitted to remain on showing to the satisfaction of the commanding officer of the post that they have made diligent and proper efforts to obtain employment.

X. Freed persons occupying premises without the authority of the United States or the permission of the owner, and who have not been heretofore held there as slaves, may be removed by the commanding officer of the post on the complaint of the owner and proof of the refusal of said freed persons to remove after ten days' notice.

XI. Any person employed or domiciled on a plantation or elsewhere, who may be rightfully dismissed by the terms of agreement, or expelled for misbehavior, shall leave the premises, and shall not return without the consent of the owner or tenant thereof.

XII. Commanding officers of districts will establish within their commands respectively suitable regulations for hiring out to labor, for a period not to exceed one year, all vagrants who cannot be advantageously employed on roads, fortifications, and other public works. The proceeds, of such labor shall be paid over to the assistant commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, to provide for aged and infirm refugees, indigent freed people, and orphan children.

XIII. The vagrant laws of the State of South Carolina, applicable to free white persons, will be recognized as the only vagrant laws applicable to the freedmen; nevertheless, such laws shall not be considered applicable to persons who are without employment, if they shall prove that they have been unable to obtain employment, after diligent efforts to do so.

XIV. It shall be the duty of officers commanding posts to see that issues of rations to freedmen are confined to destitute persons, who are unable to work because of infirmities arising from old age, or chronic diseases, orphan children too young to work, and refugee freedmen returning to their homes with the sanction of the proper authorities; and in ordering their issues, commanding officers will be careful not to encourage idleness or vagrancy. District commanders will make consolidated reports of these issues tri-monthly.

XV. The proper authorities of the State in the several municipalities and districts shall proceed to make suitable provision for their poor, without distinction of color; in default of which, the general commanding will levy an equitable tax on persons and property sufficient for the support of the poor.

XVI. The constitutional rights of all loyal and well-disposed inhabitants to bear arms will not be infringed; nevertheless this shall not be construed to sanction the unlawful practice of carrying concealed weapons; nor to authorize any person to enter with arms on the premises of another against his consent.

No one shall bear arms who has borne arms against the United States, unless he shall have taken the amnesty oath prescribed in the proclamation of the President of the United States, dated May 20, 1865, or the oath of allegiance, prescribed in the proclamation of the President, dated December 8, 1863, within the time prescribed therein. And no disorderly person, vagrant, or disturber of the peace, shall be allowed to bear arms.

XVII. To secure the same equal justice and personal liberty to the freedmen as to other inhabitants, no penalties or punishments different from those to which all persons are amenable, shall be imposed on freed people; and all crimes and offenses which are prohibited under existing laws, shall be understood as prohibited in the case of freedmen; and if committed by a freedman, shall, upon conviction, be punished in the same manner as if committed by a white man.

XVIII. Corporal punishment shall not be inflicted upon any person other than a minor, and then only by the parent, guardian, teacher, or one to whom said minor is lawfully bound by indenture of apprenticeship.

XIX. Persons whose conduct tends to a breach of the peace may be required to give security for their good behavior, and in default thereof shall be held in custody.

XX. All injuries to the person or property committed by or upon freed persons shall be punished in the manner provided by the laws of South Carolina, for like injuries to the persons or property of citizens thereof. If no provision be made by the laws of the State, then the punishment for such offenses shall be according to the course of the common law; and in the case of any injury to person or property not prohibited by the common law, or for which the punishment shall not be appropriate, such sentence shall be imposed, as, in the discretion of the court before which the trial is had, shall be deemed proper, subject to the approval of the general commanding.

XXI. All arrests, for whatever cause, will be reported tri-monthly, with the proceedings thereupon, through the prescribed channel, to the general commanding.

XXII. Commanding officers of districts, sub-districts, and posts, within their commands respectively, in the absence of the duly appointed agent, will perform any duty appertaining to the ordinary agents of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, carefully observing for their guidance all orders published by the Commissioner or assistant commissioner or other competent authority.

XXIII. District commanders will enforce these regulations by suitable instructions to sub-district and post commanders, taking care that justice be done, that fair dealing between man and man be observed, and that no unnecessary hardship and no cruel or unusual punishments be imposed upon any one.

By command of Major General D. E. Sickles:
W. L. M. BURGER,
Assistant Adjutant General.

And these are but specimens of what is necessarily done in the rebel States.

CONDITION OF TENNESSEE.

Even in Tennessee, that most loyal of all the States of the South, although by law rebels are disfranchised, yet so great is their influence by fraud and force and terror, that the military power of the nation was invoked and employed to control the elections of last August, and then "a partial execution only of the laws was obtained," and—

"The Governor was constrained to declare the elections void in twenty-nine counties of the State."

And the State Union central committee, in their address of January 9, say of "the great secession majority of Tennessee" that—

"Their sentiments, sympathies, and passions remain unchanged. They welcome peace because they are disabled from making war. They submit because they can no longer resist. They accept results they cannot reject, and profess loyalty because they have a halter around their necks. They recognize the abolition of slavery because they see it before them as a fact, but they say it was accomplished by gross violations of the Constitution, that the negro is free only in fact, but not in law or of right."

And this is their condition while they have the hope of restoration to induce good behavior, and in the presence of the military. What it will be when the military is withdrawn and they have no favors to ask we may well imagine.

And the central committee further says:

"At the next general election the entire" * * *
"power of the State must pass into the hands of those who have so long oppressed them [the Union people] and made war upon them."

And they pray that—

"If our form of government is such that to admit our Representatives to seats in Congress will compel the withdrawal of the supervising control of the national Government over our internal affairs, thereby insuring the ascendancy of the rebel majority, your memorialists prefer, and they are sure the loyal people of the State prefer, to live in a territorial condition, and even under a military government."

And this address has been indorsed by a vote of the Senate of Tennessee.

Governor Brownlow, of Tennessee, recently declared in a speech that—

"If General Thomas and his military forces were to go away and leave us, this Legislature, at the head of which I am placed, would be broken up by a mob in forty-eight hours."

And in a letter to Hon. Horace Maynard, of January 15, he says:

"The rebels of the whole South daily grow more bitter and defiant. In Middle and East Tennessee they are daily increasing in bitterness; and take the troops away, and Union men could not live in the country."

And yet I am free to say Tennessee, in advance of and in a mode different from all other rebel States, commenced the work of reconstruction, and may be more speedily entitled to recognition and representation.

General Grant, in his report of December 18, to the President, says:

"Four years of war, during which law was executed only at the point of the bayonet throughout the States in rebellion, have left the people possibly in a condition not to yield that ready obedience to civil authority the American people have generally been in the habit of yielding. This would render the presence of small garrisons throughout those States necessary until such time as labor returns to its proper channels and civil authority is fully established. I did not meet any one, either those holding places under the Government or citizens of the southern States, who think it practicable to withdraw the military from the South at present."

General Carl Schurz, in his report, says:

"I may sum up all I have said in a few words.

"If nothing were necessary but to restore the machinery of government in the States lately in rebellion in point of form, the movement made to that end by the people of the South might be considered satisfactory."

"But if it is required the southern people should also accommodate themselves to the results of the war in point of spirit, these movements fall far short of what must be insisted upon."

"The loyalty of the masses and most of the leaders of the southern people consists in submission to necessity. There is, except in individual instances, an entire absence of that national spirit which forms the basis of true loyalty and patriotism."

"The emancipation of the slaves is submitted to only in so far as chattel slavery in the old form could be kept up. But, although the freedman is no longer considered the property of the individual master, he is considered the slave of society, and all independent State legislation will show the tendency to make him such. The ordinances abolishing slavery, passed by the conventions under the pressure of circumstances, will not be looked upon as barring the establishment of a new form of servitude."

"Practical attempts on the part of the southern people to deprive the negro of his rights as a freedman may result in bloody collisions, and will certainly plunge southern society into restless fluctuations and anarchical confusion."

"Such evils can be prevented only by continuing the control of the national Government in the States lately in rebellion until free labor is fully developed and firmly established, and the advantages and blessings of the new order of things have disclosed themselves. This desirable result will be hastened by a firm declaration on the part of the Government that national control in the South will not cease until such results are secured. Only in this way can that security be established in the South which will render numerous immigration possible, and such immigration would materially aid a favorable development of things."

The purpose to maintain the State-rights heresy of judging of the extent of and resisting the national authority, is shown in the recent convention in Mississippi called to reorganize civil government there. The convention ratified the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, with three conditions; one providing—

"That the amendment shall not be construed to allow Congress to abolish slavery 'where it lawfully exists in any State that may refuse to ratify the amendment.'"

And another that—

"It shall not be construed into an approval or indorsement of the political principles or doctrines that the reserved rights of a State can, without the consent of such State, be usurped or abridged by the Federal Government, through the instrumentality of a constitutional amendment."

The whole question of our duty to ratify or provide for permanent civil State government then is resolved into this: is it expedient to set up and clothe with national and State power civil State governments which must themselves be controlled by our arms? Or while military force remains necessary, is it not better to continue provisional governments, limited to their appropriate functions? We may call government civil which is run by the military arm, but as such it is a mockery and a sham.

But when shall the States be restored to political power?

I answer that will depend on the people of the States themselves. When loyalty returns, when permanent civil government shall be practicable, in the sense that it shall bring obedience to national authority, and protect the Union population and the freedmen in the enjoyment of their rights, with security for the future assured, then can the work of restoration be made complete. When there shall be a loyal majority in any State able to control State government and prevent it from falling into the hands of traitors who will destroy it, then can State government be restored. No one can more devoutly desire the speedy coming of that day than I. I will greet and welcome to these Halls, with guarantees of peace and security and justice, the loyal Representatives of every State. But it will not come while as now in the South loyalty is regarded as a crime, and treason alone is the passport to office. It cannot come while people and Legislatures deride, despise, and set at defiance our Constitution and laws. It cannot come while Senators and Representatives are elected because they were conspicuous for treason and will continue to be traitors. We are asked to admit Herschel V. Johnson and Alexander H. Stephens as Senators from Georgia—the vice president of the rebel confederacy. If this be southern loyalty, Breckinridge and even Davis himself will speedily reënter this Capitol.

THE PRESIDENT'S POLICY.

I hear much said of the President's policy and the duty to pursue it. The great Union party of the country has, in the providence of God, been charged with the duty of preserving the national existence, and as a means to that end, of giving freedom to a race. In this work I was proud to follow its fortunes, and to hail as one of its champions the "faithful among the faithless"—Andrew Johnson.

In the hour of its triumph it is treason to mankind to desert it by betraying the interests and the hopes of the loyal into the hands of their worst enemies. No act of mine shall contribute to this result. I will yield all but patriotism, honor, and duty to preserve harmony among the depositories of its power, for if it shall perish, then, indeed, the hope of the Republic is gone. Let each department of the Government perform its appropriate function and pursue the policy marked out for us by the Constitution and the people, and the triumphs of peace will be as signal as the victories of war. The power to determine when State government is restored, to guaranty it with appropriate terms, and to say when Senators and Representatives shall be admitted is the power of the people speaking through Congress, and can never be surrendered. Let us believe that the President and Congress alike will accept their verdict and execute their will. The right of my own native State to speak in the decision of these great questions will never be surrendered by me. On this common platform all may harmoniously stand.

"The bases of our political system," said Washington in his Farewell Address, "is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government."

The right of Congress to submit to State Legislatures constitutional amendments for their approval or rejection is undoubted, and requires no action of the President. The President exacted terms of the conventions assembled under his proclamations—a ratification of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, a declaration of the nullity of secession, and a repudiation of the rebel war debt by State constitutions. He admits the justice of a constitutional change in the basis of representation and direct taxes. In his message he declares:

"That good faith requires the security of the freedmen in their liberty, their right to labor, and their right to claim the just return of their labor."

If the people demand that some or all of these or other principles be made irreversible law, a part of the Constitution, who shall deny their right or defeat their purpose to do so? In this form can terms of reconstruction and guarantees of peace be made enduring and alike applicable to all the States. In all that we do let it be our purpose to guaranty government republican in form and in fact. Let us—

"Close forever the approaches of internal feud, and so return to the ancient concord and the old way of national prosperity and permanent glory."

And when we have done this—

"Let us here, in this temple consecrated to Union" on these altars, in the presence of that image of the Father of his Country that looks down upon us, swear to preserve honorable peace with all the world and eternal brotherhood with each other."

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. Speaker, in the commercial arena, the man of business who does not often post his books is not regarded by his fellow-men as very sure of success.

In accordance with that rule, as applied to men in the commercial world, it was announced a few days ago upon the other side of the House, by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDING,] "that it was time a little posting was done."

Unlike, however, the wise man in the commercial arena who posts his own books, and learns to a fraction his own commercial status and his relation to those around him, the gentleman seemed willing to pass silently over the record of himself and his party, and with a zeal only equaled by his bitterness, undertook to post the records of the Union party of this country, against which the gentleman and his party have been so stubbornly opposed for the last five years.

But, sir, as the gentleman proclaimed to this House and the country that it was time a little posting was done, I thought with him; and let me tell the gentleman and his political friends that the great Union party which has stood by the nation's flag and borne it aloft amid the fierce storm of war, are always willing that the books should be posted, and the great measures of the party, for the support of which they have received the unmeasured abuse of traitors and their sympathizers, held up to the inspection of the patriotic millions of this land.

We are not the men, sir, to shun such an examination. The party which has shaped the policy of this nation since the election to the Presidency of the great martyr to the cause of liberty, and which has never turned its back upon the Government in its contest with treason and rebellion, and which has procured the recognition of the great principles of freedom throughout the land, has no cause for alarm when it is proposed to spread before the world its political record.

Sir, we are willing that the items of the account shall be called over, the long columns added together, a balance sheet struck, so that the people may see at a glance how the matter stands. And may I call upon the loyal people to hold to strict accountability the party who is the debtor, as appears from a posting since the beginning of the accursed rebellion.

For a long series of years prior to the election of Mr. Lincoln, the gentleman's party was in power and had possession of all the departments of the Government; we had a Democratic President, a Democratic Congress, and a Democratic judiciary. And, sir, when the Union party sent a President to this capital to take upon himself the high trust confided to him, he found a country divided, a southern confederacy formally established by a secession of a part of the States from the Union, and a new government organized with a distinguished Democrat presiding over it at another capital in the State of Georgia.

Sir, when the Union party took possession of the various departments of Government, treason, avowed and secret, infested all the high places of trust and honor, and had scattered its deadly poison among the people until Union and liberty had almost perished away. And when the President, elected according to the forms of the Constitution, in pursuance of his oath had announced to the country that he could do no less than possess and hold the property of the Government and enforce the laws, if necessary, by force; all about us we heard the cry that such declarations were unnecessary and only calculated to excite the southern heart. And, sir, when that good man from the kindness of his heart determined to supply the starving garrison at Sumter with bread, peaceably if he could, but forcibly if he must, that same party again sent up the wail, Do not undertake to send bread to that starving band of heroes; if you do, you will bring war upon our peaceful heads.

But, sir, the Government did make the effort to feed the little band of patriots, and although the shot and shell of traitors had driven them from the fort before the messenger of mercy reached them, yet, thanks to Him who rules the destinies of men and nations, they came out with flying colors, beating drums, and amid the booming of their own cannon; and from that hour the spirit of patriotism stirred the hearts of the people, and to-day we can stand in these Capitol Halls of a saved country, redeemed from the thralldom of treason and oppression.

Sir, let me remind gentlemen as we run over the items of the account and turn the historic leaves page by page, that in the Legislatures, in the White House, all over the land, prior to the inauguration of Abraham Lincoln, we heard the oft-repeated declaration that it was unconstitutional to wage a war against the rebels, because, as the gentleman's party by its President said, "You cannot coerce a State."

The people of the seceded States, as individuals, as Federal office-holders, as States, in all and every capacity in which they lived and moved and had their being, were organizing rebellion against the national Government and national Constitution; and yet that party, in possession of all the departments of the Government, by their President, told the people of this country, that notwithstanding secession was wrong and rebellion a crime, yet we cannot help it, because the States are committing these outrages and crimes, and there is no authority under the Constitution to coerce a State.

The great seal of State affixed to the ordinance of secession protected the people of the State in their conspiracy to overthrow the Government, notwithstanding each man alone and combined with all the rest was daily violating the statute-law of the Government, and committing the greatest crime known to the law in any country—the crime of treason.

But, sir, I will not dwell here. The loyal people of this country soon saw the shallowness and rottenness of such theories, and when the party now in power took possession of the several departments of the Government, these clogs which were dragging the nation down were thrown off, and the people, lead on by the great Union party, enunciated the old doctrine that the people could not commit treason, organize insurrections and rebellions, and secede from the Union at will, either as individuals, States, or combinations of States, and any attempt to do so would be resisted by all the power of the Government.

When the Union party by its Chief Executive asserted that this Union could not be dissolved at will, and that any attempt to do so would be promptly met, the war began, and I need not tell this House with what relentless fury it was waged for four years.

The old doctrine of nullification and State sovereignty had recovered from the staggering blows it received in 1832 and 1833 from the determined and heroic Jackson; and as it was nurtured into strength by the Administrations of Pierce and Buchanan, supported by the gentleman's party, it bid defiance to any national authority, and performed the quiet task of dissolving the Union by secession ordinances, and the erection on a part of the fragments of the old Union what they decreed should be a new confederacy, having for its corner-stone the divine institution of slavery, as they pleased to term it.

But, sir, to confine my remarks to a discussion and review of events as they occurred since the coming into power of the Union party. When the war began the great business of the loyal people was to save the life of the nation and crush out all its enemies. In the judgment of that party it became necessary to pass laws for the enrollment and draft, if need be, of soldiers to fight the battles of the Union. As a war measure the Union party believed it right and necessary to authorize the confiscation of the property of rebels; to proclaim the freedom of all the slaves in the rebellious districts; to allow the colored man to shoulder the musket and help the Government hold up the banner of the Republic.

It became necessary, in the judgment of the Union party, to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. It was thought wise and just to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; to repeal that abominable fugitive slave law; and, finally, in the latter half of the nineteenth century, after the nation had given its best blood and treasure, contending against a foe blinded by the love of human slavery, it was thought proper to amend that great charter given to us by our fathers, whereby slavery should be forever prohibited within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Sir, all these great measures were originated and perfected by the Union party of this country for the sake of the Union, for the cause of humanity, and for the establishment of the American Government upon the solid foundations of justice.

Who is there in all the loyal North to stand up to-day in the light of a saved nation and a free country, and say that these measures were not right?

The man who believes in the Declaration of Independence, that all men are born free and equal, and are entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and in the kindred sentiment, "Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you," can have no remorse of conscience over the repeal of the fugitive slave law, the abolition of slavery in this District, or in the complete ratification of the amendment abolishing slavery throughout the land.

But as I post the books may I turn a leaf and learn the position of the gentleman's party as these measures, one by one, came before the country? They said they were opposed to the war because they said we had no power to coerce a State, that this Government could only be maintained by peaceable means, under the administration of which one third of the States had already seceded. They were opposed to the passage of a law providing for a draft to fill up the depleted ranks of our Army in the field, because they said we were making a despotism of the Government, and the liberties of the people were thereby taken from them. They were opposed to the policy of confiscating the property of rebels during the war, because they said such laws were unconstitutional. They were opposed to the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, because they said that men were ruthlessly dragged from their peaceful homes and the freedom of speech and of the press was denied, and personal liberty destroyed. They were opposed to the repeal of the fugitive slave law because they desired not to further aggravate the southern heart by refusing to stand guard for the southern slave-driver and stop the panting negro yearning for his freedom as he sought the land of protection to him. They were opposed to the proclamation of the President setting the slaves all free, because they said we were making the war a war against slavery, and not a war for the Union. They were opposed to the policy of allowing the black man to take his place in the Union Army and help our heroes to beat back the rebel horde, because they said our gallant men would thereby be disgraced. They were opposed to the adoption of the constitutional amendment prohibiting the existence of slavery in our land, because they said we were thereby taking away the vested rights of the people to their slaves.

Sir, those measures, originated and adopted by the Union party, and ratified by the loyal people, and opposed by the party to which the gentleman belongs, have all passed into history, and under their operation and influence the life of this great nation has been purified and saved.

Sir, sir, we are charged with being false to our professions, and do not disclose to the people our real political designs. In what have we been false or hypocritical?

We declared we were for crushing the rebellion by force of arms, and we have done it. By plain legislative action we abolished slavery in this District. We repealed the fugitive slave law, and in doing it we sought to deceive no man.

The proclamation of the President freeing the slaves in the rebellious States was plain and simple, so plain that the poor down-trodden negro, unlettered and blind as he was, caught the spirit and sense of the immortal paper, and with heart full of joy and gladness, and songs of gratitude upon his lips, was ready to defend the nation so justly ruled by his great deliverer.

The amendment to the Constitution abolishing and prohibiting slavery within the jurisdiction of the United States had no secret meaning, and was designed to accomplish the great object declared by its terms.

Sir, I have given you the main items of the account as they occur in the official records of the country, though not in the order of time in which they were written. And I am willing to rest the matter in the hands of loyal people to decide.

The people know well the history of the great struggle through which we have been passing, and the relative position of the political parties, and they will be slow to believe that the Union party or its leaders have been false or hypocritical in their political action in shaping its policy or announcing its declarations of principles.

But, sir, the great question is, what is the condition of things to-day in our land, and what is our duty as Representatives of this Congress, under our sworn and registered obligations to our country, to the Constitution, to humanity, and before God, who controls the destinies of men and of nations?

The rebellion in its organized form is put down, the armies of the rebellion have surrendered, the flag that once waved in peace over the capitals of all the States of the Union again floats in triumph, with no hand even in the lately rebellious States that dare to molest it. The power of the nation has been vindicated, the problem of civil liberty has been solved, the doctrine of nullification has rightly been trampled in the dust, and to-day we find ourselves, as the Congress of the United States, charged with as great responsibilities as legislators as has rested upon any Congress since the formation of the Government.

We find among us four million free colored people. What shall be done with them? Shall we turn aside with indifference and pander to a morbid prejudice against a portion of the human race because of color? Sir, I shall not. Over one hundred and sixty thousand of these men have borne arms in defense of the Union: they came forward at the call of their Government. It is much to say their Government, when I refer to those who were slaves; but, sir, they called it their Government, and never has the instance been heard of during all the dreadful night of gloom and rebellion where one of them, old or young, bond or free, ever turned his back upon the American flag, or betrayed the cause of his country.

We have them among us, with these facts staring us in the face, and the nation is called upon by all the principles of gratitude, right, and justice to see to it that they are protected in all their natural and civil rights.

It remains for this Congress, the first since the close of the rebellion and the ratification of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, to say whether we shall show ourselves craven cowards and fail to protect these people, or whether we shall meet the responsibility and deal justly.

But, sir, as we come forward with measures of protection to these helpless people we are met again by that same negative party, which has long been a party of negative rather than a party of affirmative principles, and the cry is that we have no power under the Constitution to pass such a law as has passed this and the other House of this Congress known as the Freedmen's Bureau bill.

But, sir, that bill has become a law, as I take it for granted the Executive will sign it, and when we pass that other bill now in the House, giving to all men, without regard to color, their civil rights under the law, we shall have done but simple acts of justice, and the doing less would be a dereliction of duty for which we should justly be called to account.

We find ourselves opposed again in the Senate of the United States, and among the people, by that same party as we present the bill which I have just referred to for their support; and when we come again with a measure declaring that if the elective franchise is denied to any persons on account of race or color, that then the people of that race or color shall not be counted in the basis of representation, again we are met by the gentleman and his party declaring that our purpose is to overturn the Government and violate the Constitution because we desire to amend it in the mode prescribed by its terms.

But, sir, the Union party has a mission to perform, and in spite of all opposition of gentlemen who are fond of the ancient order of things, when liberty of speech was abridged, and the bludgeon used to silence the voice eloquently pleading for the oppressed of the land, they will move steadily on to the accomplishment of the great ends of justice, for which Governments are formed, and should be maintained; the fires of liberty are lit anew in the hearts of the people, old traditional prejudices are passing away, and the "Union and liberty, one and inseparable, now and forever," is again the watchword among the patriotic sons of America.

Mr. Speaker, I do not mean to disregard the Constitution of my country. I regard it as the great palladium of our liberties. I am for a close observance of all its wise provisions; it was the work of wise and patriotic men. It will stand as a peerless monument to the memory of our fathers who made it, surpassing the wisdom of any former time; and we should hesitate long before doing an act of doubtful constitutionality. But let us not refuse to perform a great moral and political duty, and then, to protect ourselves from the just execrations of the people, dig up some vague doubt as to the constitutionality of the measure we opposed.

But, sir, there is another great question before us, which if we would, we cannot turn aside. The rebellion in its organized form is over; and the question now is, what shall be done with that portion of our country lately under its wicked control?

In the language of the lamented Lincoln, "We all agree that the seceded States are out of their proper practical relations with the Union," and that our object is to get them into "their proper practical relations" with the Union. It is hard, Mr. Speaker, to talk about this question without admitting the fact that they were practically out of the Union. They were out of their proper relations with the Union because as State organizations they had seceded from the Union so far as they were able. They were out of their proper practical relations with the Union because the people of the rebellious States had all or nearly all openly rebelled against the Union. For four years the whole power of the people in the rebellious States was used in waging war against the Union with a ferocity unparalleled in the history of civilization. To use the language of the Chief Justice of the United States in his letter to the President on the 12th of October last, the seceded States were declared by the executive and legislative departments of the national Government to be in rebellion, and their relations to the Government broken, and, sir, that broken relation continued until the power of the national Government became greater than the power of the people of the States in rebellion. The people of the rebellious States attempted to destroy the Union by the separation of a part of the States from the Union, and by the erection upon the ruins of the old Union of another government in its stead. They failed to accomplish their design; their ordinances of secession; their resolving themselves out of the Union; their attempt to fight themselves out of the Union, all failed, and in spite of all their efforts to get out, the loyal people of the nation kept them in. No State can by any act of its own sever its connection from the Union. A State may forfeit its right to representation; its people may all commit crimes against the laws and Constitution of the Government; the proper relation of the State to the Government may be broken by the insurrections and rebellions of the people, yet the State is not out of the Union so as to lose the jurisdiction to the Government over it until all the balance of the people of the Union consent to let her go, or until a successful rebellion takes her out in spite of the efforts of the Government to keep her in.

But, sir, when I say this I do not mean to be understood as defending the theory that the Congress has no right to take hold of these States and people and examine their political condition most thoroughly. I say that, although these rebellious States are in, territorially, the Union, and cannot get out by any act of theirs, yet by their rebellion they have forfeited their right to representation in the Halls of Congress, and placed themselves where the national Government can determine at will when they shall resume again their original positions and have a voice in the legislative halls of the nation.

Sir, the very first act of rebellion was in the States passing their ordinances of secession, declaring their connection with the Union at an end; their acts of secession were followed up by confederating together in the formation of another government, and in the adoption of such measures as in their judgment would aid in the permanent establishment of that government. All the officers of state in each of the States operated together to destroy the old and build up a new government upon its ruins. By State legislation and State proclamations and State military orders, men, money, and credit were given to the organization which had for its object the dissolution of the Union by the separation of the seceded States. For four years the proper relation of these States to the Union was cut off by their separate and combined action. And yet we are told by gentlemen that after all this, after the nation has staggered under the load of debt and been sorely oppressed with taxes, after it has witnessed the sacrifice upon the battle-field and in the Libbys and Andersonvilles of three quarters of a million of her brave sons struggling with the armies of the rebellion, and after the last tragic act of the bloody drama is consummated, and the civilized world is startled as the Chief Executive is stricken down as with the dagger of a Brutus by the hand of a hired assassin—I say after all this, we are told that these people, fresh from all these scenes of carnage, are defiantly to take their places again in our national councils, and the loyal people of the always loyal States by their lawfully constituted Senators and Representatives have no constitutional power to tell them to stop one moment until we can look beyond their certificates, many of which are signed by newly-made Governors with rebel straps upon their shoulders and pardons in their pockets, and learn whether their States are now loyal or still cherishing that same spirit of rebellion and fiendish barbarity which characterized them in the struggle to destroy the nation.

Sir, before we admit these States to full fellowship again, have we not the constitutional right to stop and inquire whether they mean to come here and by political management attempt to do what they have not been able to do by the use of the sword?

But a few months ago, sir, while the honorable gentlemen now on this floor, who were members of the last Congress, were sitting in these Halls voting, to defray the expenses of the war, a thousand million dollars, the deafening sounds of the thundering artillery still rang in their ears, as it told the mournful story that another sanguinary battle was raging.

We are still voting money, sir, and authorizing loans, making more stringent the revenue laws, and taxing all the energies of our intellects to raise money to pay the soldier yet in the field, and to pay the interest upon the war debt as it becomes due. Thousands of our gallant volunteers are still in the field, pleading to be permitted to return to their loved ones at home, but are kept in the service in these rebellious States because their presence is necessary to maintain order and protect the loyal people. Sir, is it to be the policy of this Government to keep a standing army on duty in the South, and at the same time open the doors and bestow upon its people full political rights in the Government? Even in the State of Tennessee, which sends distinguished gentlemen, some of whom I personally know, and believe they are loyal men, is now patrolled by national soldiery; and we are told by the Governor that their removal would result in the expulsion of their Legislature, and death or banishment from the State of all the active loyal men.

Brownlow says:

"I give it as my candid opinion, that if the military forces were all withdrawn from Tennessee the Legislature would at once be dispersed by a rebel mob."

A. J. Fletcher, the secretary of state, says:

"Indeed, if the military was withdrawn now, the Legislature could not reassemble, nor would the Governor, or any loyal Governor, be safe for a single day."

This is the testimony of two State officers of that State.

Can it be, sir, that we are compelled by our constitutional obligations, or by any reason or law, to admit to representation a State in such condition?

Sir, if we have not the rightful power to control this question, then our Government is a sham, having no inherent power to protect itself, and treason and death will soon paralyze every vital function of its unnatural existence. The plain, liberty-loving people, sir, do not so read and interpret the Constitution. They believe that when our fathers made that immortal instrument they made it broad enough to give protection to those who stood by it and to enable the loyal people to prevent its destruction.

I believe that Congress has the full power of reconstructing the rebellious States. When I say this, I make no quarrel with the course of our President in regard to the part he has performed in attempting to reorganize and govern them since their armies surrendered. What he has done he did as an experiment and with patriotic motives, believing it to be for the best, and to be the wisest course he could pursue.

These governments are merely temporary, dictated by the President, and founded upon no civil authority, State or national, but are the result of the judgment of the President in the absence of Congress, and enforced or set aside by the military power whenever deemed necessary by military commanders under the direction or sanction of the President as Commander-in-Chief. They are, in fact, substantially military governments taking the place of the civil governments which were displaced, being in the interest of rebellion.

If such is the fact, of which there can be no doubt, where is the authority for saying that the men, styling themselves Representatives and Senators, sent here by a military government established by the President of the United States in his own mode and manner, without consulting the laws or State governments as they existed at the close of the rebellion, are entitled to seats upon this floor? I am unable, sir, to discover that there is any legal or constitutional provision requiring us to admit them; and it behooves us to move exceedingly carefully as we perform the work of reorganizing these States and see to it that we do not fritter away the golden opportunity of placing the Government upon a basis of just and right principles which, if rigidly adhered to by the people in the future, will be a sure guarantee against any more rebellions.

If the people of the rebellious States are still disloyal, there is no provision of the Constitution entitling them to representation in the Congress of the United States. If it is true that we are required to patrol those States with an army to protect the loyal white men and poor freedmen and to suppress treason, where is the propriety of admitting them to representation?

I read, Mr. Speaker, in the Constitution of my country that—

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members."

I read that—

"Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

I read in the Constitution that the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

These, sir, are some of the plain provisions of the Constitution, and are intended as safeguards to the perpetuity and purity of the Republic. Under them, I am sure we are not required to admit Representatives from States not republican in form nor grant representation to a disloyal people. The "general welfare" of the country, by such a magnanimous proceeding, would not be very greatly subserved.

When the people of the United States declared to the world that they made the Constitution "in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity," they did not realize that those sublime declarations were all glittering generalities, and that under the Constitution so ordained the recognition of rebellious States to full fellowship in the Union was calculated to form a more perfect Union, to establish justice, promote the general welfare, insure domestic tranquillity, or secure the blessings of liberty to the people.

Sir, I will not dwell longer upon this subject; the proposition is too plain that when the people of a State rebel against the authority of the national Government, so that its proper practical relation to the Government is broken, the right of representation of such State by its rebellion is destroyed, and the State can be held to its obligations to the Union and restored to the privilege of representation when in the judgment of the sovereign Government it may be safe so to do.

I do not desire to deal harshly with these States or any fallen enemy. Rather would I turn from the scenes of rebellion and barbarity which have been enacted by those engaged in the attempt to overthrow the Republic, and look upon a brighter, better scene as we commence the great work of rebuilding upon the scattered ruins of those once prosperous States. I shall not be guided in my action as a legislator by malice or revenge. But, sir, I cannot forget the thousands of brave and gallant men who laid down their lives in the terrible struggle that the nation might live. I cannot forget that four long years were required to crush out the causeless, wicked rebellion against the best Government in the world.

Sir, I cannot forget that night in April last when that great man, so fitly styled the saviour of his country, was murdered by a fiend, pushed on by the maddened exasperation of a dying rebellion.

Sir, I perhaps feel as keenly the result of that last tragic act as any man upon this floor. Abraham Lincoln, a martyr for the cause of liberty and patriotism, murdered by traitors, now sleeps in the bosom of my own State and city; the patriotic sons of the Prairie State will closely guard his honored remains. And as we proceed in the performance of our responsible duties, let us stand by that old maxim, "Let justice be done though the heavens shall fall."

Mr. PLANTS. If it is the pleasure of the House to adjourn now, or if some other gentleman desires to speak at this time, I will yield the floor. I am rather too hoarse to speak now without great inconvenience to myself.

Mr. GRINNELL. I will move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned till Monday next.

Mr. COWAN. I beg leave to present the petition of John E. Gillett, and a large number of citizens of Philadelphia, setting forth that the specific tax of one dollar a barrel levied by the United States on crude petroleum is onerous and disproportionate to the tax on any other product of the mines, and praying that the law may be so modified that a percentage tax upon sales at the wells may be adopted. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a petition signed by the president and secretary of a convention of the colored people of the State of Florida, held on the 12th of December, 1865, for the purpose of setting forth the grievances and disabilities under which they are laboring. They set forth in this petition that, among other things, the white people refuse to rent to the colored people land for cultivation. They ask a remedy for that, and pray Congress to secure to them a homestead. They also ask Congress to secure to them an education, and they conclude their prayer by asking from Congress protection of their civil rights, including the right of the elective franchise. I ask the reference of the petition to the committee on reconstruction.

It was so referred.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer several petitions, numerously signed by citizens of New York, asking Congress to secure in the rebel States a truly republican form of government, and in this way to carry out the solemn obligation of the Constitution; also, to establish irreversible guarantees, and to act on the principle that emancipation is not complete so long as any black code exists, whether affecting civil or political rights. I ask the reference of this petition to the committee on reconstruction.

It was so referred.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have a petition, numerously signed, from Portland, in the State of Maine, and adjoining towns, representing certain guarantees as necessary in order to secure a proper reconstruction of the rebellious States. With the leave of the Senate I will read part of it. They pray Congress—

"Second. Not to allow any distinction on account of color or descent in the laws and municipal regulations of the District of Columbia, the national capital, whose institutions, ordained by Congress, stand before the world as representative of the national spirit and character."

They propose for ratification several amendments to the Constitution, the second of which is:

"If, by the constitution or laws of any State, persons are denied, on account of their race or color, the right of voting equally with others, then its inhabitants of that race or color shall not be counted in determining its number of Representatives in Congress."

The fourth is:

"In no State which shall hereafter be admitted into this Union, or which may have attempted to withdraw from it, shall there be any distinction in the constitution, laws, or municipal regulations on account of color or descent, or any payment, either by the State or the United States, for emancipated slaves."

There are several others which I have not read, which appear on the face of the petition. I move the reference of this petition to the committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask leave to present the petition of William C. Bryant, and others, officers of the American Free Trade League, asking for a continuance of the reciprocity treaty between the United States and the British Provinces, and that the scope of the treaty be so enlarged as to provide for an entirely free interchange of all goods between the Provinces and this country, subject to no other taxes or duties than are necessary to make the goods imported in this way contribute as much to our internal revenue as would be levied upon them if of domestic origin. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to present the petition of "mechanics and laborers in American manufacturing establishments, and members of that great creative force whose hands built and equipped our Navy and supplied the materials that armed, equipped, and kept the nation's armies in the field, and literally saved its life," on the subject of the tariff. The latter clause of the petition is in these words:

"The workmen of the United States ask only equality in the race between nations for supremacy in wealth and power."

I only desire to say that I am glad they have got in the word "equality" instead of "protection." I like the word better. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Daniel Winslow, with the accompanying papers on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Kansas, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Territories be discharged from the further consideration of a petition of citizens of Houston, Texas, praying for the construction of a railroad across the Indian Territory, from the south line of Kansas to the Red river; and that it be referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred various petitions praying for such an amendment of the Constitution of the United States as will forever prohibit any State from making any distinction in civil rights and privileges among citizens of the United States on account of race, color, or descent, have instructed me to report them back, as that subject is under consideration, and has been acted on by the Senate; and to ask that the committee be discharged, and that the petitions lie on the table.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. M. J. Dixon, of Alexandria, Virginia, praying to have certain property which has been sold under the law for the collection of direct taxes restored to her, or the avails of it, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Preston Starritt, formerly a messenger in the Senate, praying for compensation which he alleges has been illegally withheld from him, have instructed me to report it back accompanied by a resolution. I ask that it be acted upon at this time if there be no objection. It is an old matter, and the resolution will explain itself.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That Preston Starritt, a former messenger of the Senate, having been paid the sum of $480 50, in pursuance of a resolution of the Senate adopted March 2, 1865, being in full for his services to December 17, 1861, when his office was vacated, is not entitled to any further compensation.

No. 126) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the city of Placerville, in the State of California, to the most feasible point of intersection with the Pacific railroad, in the State of Nevada, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 133) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the waters of the bay of San Francisco to Humboldt bay, in the State of California, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 140) to grant the right of way to the Humboldt Canal Company through the public lands of the United States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the papers in relation to the claim of John Egenolf, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. NESMITH, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 105) to grant the right of way to the Cascade Railroad Company through a military reserve in Washington Territory, reported it without amendment.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 107) to provide for a term of the district court for the district of Minnesota to be held at the city of Winona, in said district, reported it without amendment.

Mr. NORTON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Theodor G. Eiswald, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 150) for the relief of Theodor G. Eiswald. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. NYE, from the Committee on Territories, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 155) concerning the boundaries of the State of Nevada; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FESSENDEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 149) for the relief of Daniel Winslow; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 151) for the relief of George B. Simpson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 152) to grant the right of way through the public domain for the construction of highways and canals and ditches for mining, agricultural, and manufacturing purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 153) granting certain lands to the State of Minnesota to aid in the improvement of navigation of the Zambro river in said State; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 154) concerning national banks in certain States and Territories; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 156) making additional grant of lands to the State of Minnesota in alternate sections to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

DISBANDMENT OF MILITIA.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 32) to disband the militia forces in certain States, and to prohibit their reorganization; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and be printed. Before the vote is taken on the reference, I wish briefly to explain why I introduce the joint resolution at this time. I hold in my hand an extract from a letter of General Thomas, at the head of the Freedmen's Bureau in Mississippi, in which he says:

"Nearly all the dissatisfaction that now exists among the freedmen is caused by the abusive conduct of the militia. It has assisted to paralyze labor, and add to the combination of difficulties under which the State has labored." * * * "Only a short time ago, Governor Humphrey admitted to me that two companies of the militia had sworn that in their counties no negro who did not work for his old master, and no Yankee could live; that they would 'drive out the thieving Yankees and shoot the niggers.'"

I have also a letter from General Tillson, commanding in Georgia; and here let me say that General Tillson is an officer who was educated at West Point, and he is an officer of marked ability. He says:

"In almost every case as heretofore reported, the withdrawal of troops has been followed by outrages on the freed people; their school-houses have been burned, their teachers driven off or threatened with death, and the freed people by fraud, and even by violence, made to enter into unjust and fraudulent contracts. It requires the most careful nursing and culture to keep alive even a show of justice toward the freed people. Nearly all the females and young men * * * are open and defiant in their expressions of hate for Yankees and negroes. A large number of troops is not required, but * * * 'the highest and best interests of the State, as well as of the freed people, require an addition to the force now in the department.'"

He says that there are but two thousand soldiers in the State of Georgia, and that more are necessary, and that as the troops are withdrawn from that State great outrages are perpetrated wherever they are withdrawn. I have a letter from General Swayne, commanding in Alabama, in which he makes the same complaint in regard to the withdrawal of troops. Referring to the local militia, he says:

"During the month we have come, though not exactly into collision, yet into very direct contact, with the militia system of this State." * * * "Every species of outrage is committed under them in some counties in this State."

In regard to the withdrawal of the troops, General Swayne says:

"Some time since, on an intimation from Major General Woods, commanding department, I filed with him my emphatic protest against the removal of the troops, feeling sure that their presence is as yet indispensable to the comfort and security, not only of the freedmen, but of other parties who naturally confide first in the General Government."

* * * "The talk of insurrection is nonsense. The solemn pledge of the United States to the free people of color that they shall be and remain free, requires that the law, by whomsoever made and administered, and including these provisions, shall be faithfully and equally applied to all men without distinction on account of color."

I have a letter from General Hartsuff, dated at New Orleans, stating the condition of affairs as he finds them in the State of Louisiana. General Hartsuff, who is known by many Senators here to be a man of ability and character and judgment, says:

"I have not been here long, but quite long enough to ascertain the temper and tendency of the people. Indeed, both are so apparent that 'he who runs may read'; their bitterness is increasing. If in any place of amusement a single bar of the 'Bonnie Blue Flag,' or any other air they have adopted is played, or a defiant or rebellious allusion made, it calls forth a perfect storm of applause. In social gatherings, I am told by those who visit them, the same feelings exist and grow. If a man meets his former slave, to whom he may have been kind, he not infrequently, in the presence of others, tries to cajole or extort from the poor fellow an admission of preference for the old condition, and if he succeeds through the desire of not offending the old master, as is sometimes the case, it is printed too, and quoted in triumph ever after. A small force, if under good officers, will preserve the peace, but there is much disaffection and carelessness in the performance of duty among the volunteers now, both officers and privates. I think justice to these men, who all want to go home, and to the best interests of the country, which requires on the part of officers that their heart shall be in their duties, absolutely demands that an Army bill shall quickly pass, and the Army organized under it take the place of those who now perform such unwilling duty."

Brevet General Howard, brother of Major General O. O. Howard, at the head of the Freedmen's Bureau, reports that he obtained information while in Georgia,

"From officers and agents of the bureau as well as from the military authorities and the newspapers, that the militia organizations of the opposite county, in South Carolina (Edgefield) were engaged in disarming the negroes. This created great discontent among the latter, and in some instances they had offered resistance. In previous inspection tours in South Carolina, much complaint reached me of the misconduct of these militia companies toward the blacks. Some of the latter, of the most intelligent and well disposed, came to me and said, 'What shall we do?' These militia companies are heaping upon our people every sort of injury and insult, unchecked. Our people are peaceably inclined, and we are endeavoring to inculcate good feeling; but we cannot bear this treatment much longer. Many are beginning to say, 'We have been patient long enough; we are free men now, and we have submitted to such usage as long as we can.' And again they ask, 'What shall we do?' I assured them that this conduct was not sanctioned by the United States military authorities, and that it would not be allowed."

They then asked what they should do when the United States troops were withdrawn, saying they had nothing but evil to apprehend from these militia organizations.

Now, at Augusta, about two months later, I have authentic information that these abuses continue. In southwestern Georgia, I learned that the militia had done the same, sometimes pretending to act under orders from United States authorities. I reported these facts to General Brannon, commanding the department of Georgia, and to General Sickles, commanding the department of South Carolina.

"I am convinced that these militia organizations only endanger the peace of the communities where they exist, and are a source of constant annoyance and injury to the freed people; that herein is one of the greatest evils existing in the southern States for the freedmen. They give the color of law to their violent, unjust, and sometimes inhuman proceedings."

"I would earnestly recommend that these organizations be abolished in these States for at least several years to come; and that some suitable substitute be instituted as a general police force, to preserve order and maintain the laws, until it again becomes safe to allow the organization of militia."

I have a letter from the western part of Louisiana, on the borders of Texas, written by an officer of the Army, a gentleman of intelligence and character, with whom I served twenty-five years ago in the Legislature of my State. He says:

"You have never conceived of the abuse, the cruelty, the premeditated butchery now practiced upon the colored race in this region and the bordering counties of Texas. Not a day or a night passes but what many victims are murdered by the white confederate citizens. In some instances the murderers black their faces and dress up like negro troops, go through the country robbing and killing all classes. One day I saw three bodies (colored) floating down the river at this place: one with his throat cut, one with his brains blown out, and the other mangled. The work of death is going on all the time, but on the increase. A week ago a black man led by his little boy called upon me. He had both eyes put out by a gunshot because he would not renew his contract to work, when, as he said, his master had refused to pay him under the old contract. All his family were threatened with death and turned out of their cabin, while he, blind and starving, was trying to find a shelter for them. All around in the country is one tale of abuse, woe, and misery, the master taking vengeance because his slaves are free. Their suffering beggars description."

The colored population are mild and peaceable, and all stories of risings and clamor are false. They work when they can get the promise of small pay, which they too frequently do not realize.

"There is not one spark of love for the Union in all that I have seen or can judge; but bitter, unrelenting hate, full of the spirit of hell and death to the black man and his white benefactor. A leading man in this place told me a few days ago that they should not rest till paid for their freed slaves; if they could not get this they would exterminate them. I can assure you, in the country away from notice the negro has not half the protection that he had five or even one year ago. The most ignorant, corrupt, and unprincipled set of men exist and rule society here on the earth. They have been forced back into the Union greater sinners now than when out of it. Could northern Senators travel through the South, stop and see it as it is, they would be appalled at the atrocities practiced and the undying hate toward northern men. With the troops away a northern life would be a thing of the past. I care not what freedmen's agents may say of the good condition of the blacks. I say their condition is wretched and heart-rending, and all by the abuse and studied persecution of their former masters. All the men from General Grant, General Howard, &c., down, who pay flying visits to the South, knowing of the state of society and suffering, nothing of the persistent determination to kill out the black race. Our officers and soldiers are tired and homesick, and conceal much information that they possess so that the necessity of their remaining shall not appear, and too frequently turn a deaf ear to suffering humanity."

From officers and soldiers in the rebel States, from truly loyal men there comes an unbroken chain of testimony going to show that the withdrawal of the troops of the United States is immediately followed by outrages upon the freedmen and upon men of known loyalty. There can be no doubt whatever that the arming of the rebel militia has been disastrous to peace and security of loyal men and freedmen. I trust Congress will see to it that armed rebels are not permitted to outrage the rights and endanger the lives of the people.

Mr. SAULSBURY. On the question of the reference of this resolution I should not say a word but for the remarks made by the Senator from Massachusetts in support of that motion. The proposition now before the Senate is to disarm the militia of a State. I shall vote against the reference of the subject to a committee of the body, because the Congress of the United States have no power under that old, obsolete instrument, the Constitution of the United States, to disarm the militia of a State. I know that there is one provision of the Constitution which says that Congress shall have power

"To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress."

That does not give power to Congress to disarm the militia of a State, or to destroy the militia of a State, because in another provision of the Constitution, the second amendment, we have these words:

"A well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed."

The proposition here is not to carry out by legislation of Congress any right or authority vested in Congress, but it is an application to Congress to do that which Congress has no right to do under the second amendment of the Constitution. Mississippi is a State in the Union recognized by the President of the United States, the chief executive officer of the country. As such, she has her own Governor, she has her own judiciary, she has her own State machinery, as any other State has, for protecting the interests of her people; and unless the power is lodged in Congress to disarm the militia of Massachusetts, it cannot be pretended that any such power is lodged in Congress in reference to the State of Mississippi.

We hear a great deal about the oppressions of the negroes down South, and a complaint here comes from somebody connected with the Freedmen's Bureau. Only the other day I saw a statement in the papers that a negro, in violation of the laws of Kentucky, was found with concealed weapons upon his person. The law of Kentucky, I believe, is applicable to whites and blacks alike. An officer of the Freedmen's Bureau, however, summoned the judge of the court before him, ordered him to deliver up the pistol to that negro, and to refund the fine to which the negro was subject by the law of Kentucky. The other day your papers stated that one of these negroes shot down a Federal officer in the State of Tennessee. Yet, sir, no petitions are here to protect the white people against the outrages committed by the negro population; but if a few letters are written to members here that oppression has been practiced against negroes, then the whole white population of a State are to be disarmed.

I protest, Mr. President, against even the reference of such a proposition to a committee, on the ground that if the committee were to report in favor of disarming the militia of the State of Mississippi, the Congress of the United States have no power under the Constitution, but are solemnly prohibited by the Constitution from taking any such action.

Mr. WILSON. I would simply say, Mr. President, that these men were once disarmed when General Lee and General Johnston and the other rebel generals surrendered. They are the same men. They have been organized again and arms put in their hands, and they are just as loyal and law-abiding now as they were when they were confederate soldiers. There is one unbroken chain of testimony from all people that are loyal to this country, that the greatest outrages are perpetrated by armed men who go up and down the country searching houses, disarming people, committing outrages of every kind and description. There cannot be any doubt about that. The generals commanding in these departments all understand it, and let me say to the Senator that there is in the rebel States to-day scarcely an officer of the United States who is not of one opinion about all these acts.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Has the Congress of the United States the power to disarm the militia of the State of Massachusetts?

Mr. WILSON. I am not prepared to answer that question. Jefferson Davis maintained here some years ago that the militia was a part of the Army of the United States.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not regard him as authority.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator will find that that was the doctrine laid down by that distinguished chief of the rebellion. I will say to that Senator that I believe this Congress has power to disarm ruffians or traitors, or men who are committing outrages against law or the rights of men on our common humanity. I have no doubt of our right to prevent the organization in the rebel States of any militia force, or any other force, until we define what it shall be.

To motion to print the joint resolution and refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia was agreed to.

THOMAS F. WILSON.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up for consideration Senate bill No. 146.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 146) for the relief of Thomas F. Wilson, late United States consul at Bahia, Brazil; the question being on its passage.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that that bill be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce, with a view to having a report submitted.

Mr. CHANDLER. Before the question is put on that motion, I ask that the petition of the claimant be read; all the facts stated in it have been verified before the committee.

The Secretary read the petition, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The petition of the undersigned respectfully sheweth, that during the years 1862, 1863, and 1864 he was in the service of the United States as consul at Bahia, Brazil.

That during that time the port of Bahia was the rendezvous of the pirates Alabama, Georgia, and Florida for the south Atlantic, where they met their tenders and supply ships and landed prisoners captured on board of American merchant vessels, having at one time landed over one hundred destitute persons on his hands.

That by reason of the visits of these pirates and their consorts to that port, additional duties and increased expenses were imposed upon him not incident to the consulate in a time of peace. That the salary, which was fixed at the sum of $1,500 per annum, was inadequate to the increased duties and expenses of the consulate growing out of the state of war in which the United States was then involved.

That at the time the pirate Florida came into that harbor, he repaired on board the United States steam sloop-of-war Wachusett, which was lying in port at the time, and advised and participated in the capture of the pirate in the port of Bahia; and that after the pirate had surrendered to the Wachusett the Brazilian forts and vessels-of-war opened fire on the Wachusett and drove that vessel out of port, which prevented him from landing, and compelled him to abandon the consulate, together with his residence, which contained his household furniture, library, clothing, and personal effects, the greater part of which he has not been able to recover, and he has thereby sustained a loss of about fifteen hundred dollars.

He therefore prays for the passage of an act affording him relief for the above losses.

THOMAS F. WILSON.

Mr. CHANDLER. The facts in this case are set forth in the petition. It was under Mr. Wilson's advisement that the Wachusett did cut out the Florida and bring her into a United States port, and he came home on board the Wachusett and has never returned. If the Government of the United States had not repudiated his action he would have had through this Government a just claim upon the Government of Brazil which would have been paid, but this Government having repudiated his action it bars him from any claim against the Government of Brazil. Through his action the Florida was seized; a large number of our ships-of-war were released from their pursuit of the Florida, a great saving was made to the Government of many millions, as well as to the commerce of the United States. Although the Government repudiated his action, it never returned the Florida; nor would that return have been permitted even had any agent of this Government undertaken to return the Florida to the pirate in command of her. The Florida was not returned, thus barring the claim of Mr. Wilson against the Government of Brazil. The question now is, will this Government pay this claim when by its own act it has prevented him from collecting it where it ought to have been collected? I think that it is due to Mr. Wilson and it is due to the Government that the claim should be promptly paid. I wish that during the late rebellion we had had more Mr. Wilsons, and I wish that we had had more naval officers such as the captain of the Wachusett. I believe the civilized world would have sanctioned the cutting out of any one of the rebel piratical vessels from any port on earth. I wish it had been done. I wish our officers had sunk the crafts wherever they found them; but they did not. Here is a case now where we may do a little justice. I hope this bill will be passed, and passed promptly, and passed unanimously. It is not a precedent for any other case, for no other case of the kind ever has occurred or probably ever will occur on earth. I ask for the action of the Senate on the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President—

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Iowa will excuse me for interposing, but I must ask whether the joint resolution for the amendment of the Constitution is not now before the Senate.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it is the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of Friday last, which is the joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States, upon which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. YATES] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOWARD. Before the Senator from Illinois proceeds, I wish to present an amendment to the resolution under discussion, and to ask that it be printed for the information of the Senate.

The proposed amendment was received informally, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to hear that amendment read.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment, which was to strike out all after the word "taxed" in the twelfth line of the resolution and to insert the following:

And the right of voting for electors of President and Vice President of the United States, for members of the House of Representatives, and for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, is hereby granted to the following classes of persons of African descent, citizens of the United States, namely, all males of the age of twenty-one years who have during the late troubles been duly enrolled in the Army or Navy of the United States; all males of like age able to read and write the English, French, or Spanish language; all males of like age in the possession and enjoyment in their own right of property, real or personal, of the value of $250; all such persons who have been domiciled in the proper election district for at least six months next before an election at which they claim to vote; but no such person to be allowed to vote who is of unsound mind, a pauper, or under conviction of an infamous crime. And Congress shall, in default of State laws necessary to carry into effect this provision, have full power so to do by legislation applicable to all the States.

Mr. YATES addressed the Senate. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania desires the floor on the question now under consideration.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Yes, sir, for to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The floor being awarded to the Senator, I move to lay this subject aside and make it the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

During Mr. YATES's speech the following message was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of Mr. ROBERT JOHNSON, his Secretary:

Mr. President, I am directed by the President of the United States to inform the Senate that he approved and signed, on the 11th instant, the bill (S. No. 96) authorizing an increase of the clerical force in the Post Office Department.

I am further directed by the President of the United States to return to the Senate, in which it originated, the bill (S. No. 60) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen, Refugees, and Abandoned Lands,' with his objections thereto in writing.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU—VETO MESSAGE.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now ask for the reading of the message from the President, returning a bill with his objections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will be read.

The Secretary read the message, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have examined with care the bill which originated in the Senate and has been passed by the two Houses of Congress to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees," and for other purposes. Having, with much regret, come to the conclusion that it would not be consistent with the public welfare to give my approval to the measure, I return the bill to the Senate with my objections to its becoming a law.

I might call to mind in advance of these objections that there is no immediate necessity for the proposed measure. The act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, which was approved in the month of March last, has not yet expired. It was thought stringent and extensive enough for the purpose in view in time of war. Before it ceases to have effect further experience may assist to guide us to a wise conclusion as to the policy to be adopted in time of peace.

I share with Congress the strongest desire to secure to the freedmen the full enjoyment of their freedom and property, and their entire independence and equality in making contracts for their labor; but the bill before me contains provisions which in my opinion are not warranted by the Constitution, and are not well suited to accomplish the end in view.

The bill proposes to establish, by authority of Congress, military jurisdiction over all parts of the United States containing refugees and freedmen. It would, by its very nature, apply with most force to those parts of the United States in which the freedmen most abound; and it expressly extends the existing temporary jurisdiction of the Freedmen's Bureau with greatly enlarged powers over those States "in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion." The source from which this military jurisdiction is to emanate is none other than the President of the United States, acting through the War Department and the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau. The agents to carry out this military jurisdiction are to be selected either from the Army or from civil life; the country is to be divided into districts and sub-districts; and the number of salaried agents to be employed may be equal to the number of counties or parishes in all the United States where freedmen and refugees are to be found.

The subjects over which this military jurisdiction is to extend in every part of the United States include protection to "all employés, agents, and officers of this bureau in the exercise of the duties imposed" upon them by the bill. In eleven States it is further to extend over all cases affecting freedmen and refugees discriminated against "by local law, custom, or prejudice." In those eleven States the bill subjects any white person who may be charged with depriving a freedman of "any civil rights or immunities belonging to white persons" to imprisonment or fine, or both, without, however, defining the "civil rights and immunities" which are thus to be secured to the freedmen by military law. This military jurisdiction also extends to all questions that may arise respecting contracts. The agent who is thus to exercise the office of a military judge may be a stranger, entirely ignorant of the laws of the place, and exposed to the errors of judgment to which all men are liable. The exercise of power, over which there is no legal supervision, by so vast a number of agents as is contemplated by the bill, must, by the very nature of man, be attended by acts of caprice, injustice, and passion.

The trials, having their origin under this bill, are to take place without the intervention of a jury, and without any fixed rules of law or evidence. The rules on which offenses are to be "heard and determined" by the numerous agents, are such rules and regulations as the President, through the War Department, shall prescribe. No previous presentment is required, nor any indictment charging the commission of a crime against the laws; but the trial must proceed on charges and specifications. The punishment will be, not what the law declares, but such as a court-martial may think proper; and from these arbitrary tribunals there lies no appeal, no writ of error to any of the courts in which the Constitution of the United States vests exclusively the judicial power of the country.

While the territory and the classes of actions and offenses that are made subject to this measure are so extensive, the bill itself, should it become a law, will have no limitation in point of time, but will form a part of the permanent legislation of the country. I cannot reconcile a system of military jurisdiction of this kind with the words of the Constitution, which declare that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless upon a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land and naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger;" and that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State or district wherein the crime shall have been committed." The safeguards which the experience and wisdom of ages taught our fathers to establish as securities for the protection of the innocent, the punishment of the guilty, and the equal administration of justice, are to be set aside, and for the sake of a more vigorous interposition in behalf of justice, we are to take the risk of the many acts of injustice that would necessarily follow from an almost countless number of agents established in every parish or county in nearly a third of the States of the Union, over whose decisions there is to be no supervision or control by the Federal courts. The power that would be thus placed in the hands of the President is such as in time of peace certainly ought never to be intrusted to any one man.

If it be asked whether the creation of such a tribunal within a State is warranted as a measure of war, the question immediately presents itself whether we are still engaged in war. Let us not unnecessarily disturb the commerce and credit and industry of the country by declaring to the American people and to the world that the United States are still in a condition of civil war. At present there is no part of our country in which the authority of the United States is disputed. Offenses that may be committed by individuals should not work a forfeiture of the rights of whole communities. The country has returned or is returning to a state of peace and industry, and the rebellion is in fact at an end. The measure, therefore, seems to be as inconsistent with the actual condition of the country as it is at variance with the Constitution of the United States.

If, passing from general considerations, we examine the bill in detail, it is open to weighty objections.

In time of war it was eminently proper that we should provide for those who were passing suddenly from a condition of bondage to a state of freedom. But this bill proposes to make the Freedmen's Bureau, established by the act of 1865 as one of many great and extraordinary military measures to suppress a formidable rebellion, a permanent branch of the public administration, with its powers greatly enlarged. I have no reason to suppose, and I do not understand it to be alleged, that the act of March, 1865, has proved deficient for the purpose for which it was passed, although at that time, and for a considerable period thereafter, the Government of the United States remained unacknowledged in most of the States whose inhabitants had been involved in the rebellion. The institution of slavery, for the military destruction of which the Freedmen's Bureau was called into existence as an auxiliary, has been already effectually and finally abrogated throughout the whole country by an amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and practically its eradication has received the assent and concurrence of most of those States in which it at any time had an existence. I am not, therefore, able to discern, in the condition of the country, anything to justify an apprehension that the powers and agencies of the Freedmen's Bureau, which were effective for the protection of freedmen and refugees during the actual continuance of hostilities and of African servitude, will now, in a time of peace and after the abolition of slavery, prove inadequate to the same proper ends. If I am correct in these views, there can be no necessity for the enlargement of the powers of the bureau, for which provision is made in the bill.

The third section of the bill authorizes a general and unlimited grant of support to the destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen, their wives and children. Succeeding sections make provision for the rent or purchase of landed estates for freedmen, and for the erection for their benefit of suitable buildings for asylums and schools, the expenses to be defrayed from the Treasury of the whole people. The Congress of the United States has never heretofore thought itself empowered to establish asylums beyond the limits of the District of Columbia, except for the benefit of our disabled soldiers and sailors. It has never founded schools for any class of our own people, not even for the orphans of those who have fallen in the defense of the Union, but has left the care of education to the much more competent and efficient control of the States, of communities, of private associations, and of individuals. It has never deemed itself authorized to expend the public money for the rent or purchase of homes for the thousands, not to say millions, of the white race, who are honestly toiling from day to day for their subsistence. A system for the support of indigent persons in the United States was never contemplated by the authors of the Constitution, nor can any good reason be advanced why, as a permanent establishment, it should be founded for one class or color of our people more than another. Pending the war, many refugees and freedmen received support from the Government, but it was never intended that they should thenceforth be fed, clothed, educated, and sheltered by the United States. The idea on which the slaves were assisted to freedom was that, on becoming free, they would be a self-sustaining population. Any legislation that shall imply that they are not expected to attain a self-sustaining condition must have a tendency injurious alike to their character and their prospects.

The appointment of an agent for every county and parish will create an immense patronage; and the expense of the numerous officers and their clerks, to be appointed by the President, will be great in the beginning, with a tendency steadily to increase. The appropriations asked by the Freedmen's Bureau, as now established, for the year 1866, amount to $11,745,000. It may be safely estimated that the cost to be incurred under the pending bill will require double that amount—more than the entire sum expended in any one year under the administration of the second Adams. If the presence of agents in every parish and county is to be considered as a war measure, opposition, or even resistance, might be provoked, so that, to give effect to their jurisdiction, troops would have to be stationed within reach of every one of them, and thus a large standing force be rendered necessary. Large appropriations would therefore be required to sustain and enforce military jurisdiction in every county or parish, from the Potomac to the Rio Grande. The condition of our fiscal affairs is encouraging; but in order to sustain the present measure of public confidence, it is necessary that we practice not merely customary economy, but, as far as possible, severe retrenchment.

In addition to the objections already stated, the fifth section of the bill proposes to take away land from its former owners without any legal proceedings being first had, contrary to that provision of the Constitution which declares that no person shall "be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." It does not appear that a part of the lands to which this section refers may not be owned by minors, or persons of unsound mind, or by those who have been faithful to all their obligations as citizens of the United States. If any portion of the land is held by such persons, it is not competent for any authority to deprive them of it. If, on the other hand, it be found that the property is liable to confiscation, even then it cannot be appropriated to public purposes until by due process of law it shall have been declared forfeited to the Government.

There is still further objection to the bill on grounds seriously affecting the class of persons to whom it is designed to bring relief. It will tend to keep the mind of the freedman in a state of uncertain expectation and restlessness, while to those among whom he lives it will be a source of constant and vague apprehension.

Undoubtedly the freedman should be protected, but he should be protected by the civil authorities, especially by the exercise of all the constitutional powers of the courts of the United States and of the States. His condition is not so exposed as may at first be imagined. He is in a portion of the country where his labor cannot well be spared. Competition for his services from planters, from those who are constructing or repairing railroads, and from capitalists in his vicinage or from other States, will enable him to command almost his own terms. He also possesses a perfect right to change his place of abode; and if, therefore, he does not find in one community or State a mode of life suited to his desires, or proper remuneration for his labor, he can move to another, where that labor is more esteemed and better rewarded. In truth, however, each State, induced by its own wants and interests, will do what is necessary and proper to retain within its borders all the labor that is needed for the development of its resources. The laws that regulate supply and demand will maintain their force, and the wages of the laborer will be regulated thereby. There is no danger that the exceedingly great demand for labor will not operate in favor of the laborer.

Neither is sufficient consideration given to the ability of the freedmen to protect and take care of themselves. It is no more than justice to them to believe that as they have received their freedom with moderation and forbearance, so they will distinguish themselves by their industry and thrift, and soon show the world that in a condition of freedom they are self-sustaining, capable of selecting their own employment and their own places of abode, of insisting, for themselves, on a proper remuneration, and of establishing and maintaining their own asylums and schools. It is earnestly hoped that instead of wasting away, they will, by their own efforts, establish for themselves a condition of respect, ability, and prosperity. It is certain that they can attain to that condition only through their own merits and exertions.

In this connection the query presents itself, whether the system proposed by the bill will not, when put into complete operation, practically transfer the entire care, support, and control of four million emancipated slaves to agents, overseers, or task-masters who, appointed at Washington, are to be located in every county and parish throughout the United States containing freedmen and refugees? Such a system would inevitably tend to a concentration of power in the Executive, which would enable him, if so disposed, to control the action of this numerous class and use them for the attainment of his own political ends.

I cannot but add another very grave objection to this bill. The Constitution imperatively declares, in connection with taxation, that each State shall have at least one Representative, and fixes the rule for the number to which in future times each State shall be entitled. It also provides that the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, and adds with peculiar force, "that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." The original act was necessarily passed in the absence of the States chiefly to be affected, because their people were then contumaciously engaged in the rebellion. Now the case is changed, and some at least of those States are attending Congress by loyal Representatives, soliciting the allowance of the constitutional right of representation. At the time, however, of the consideration and the passing of this bill, there was no Senator or Representative in Congress from the eleven States which are to be mainly affected by its provisions. The very fact that reports were and are made against the good disposition of the people of that portion of the country is an additional reason why they need, and should have Representatives of their own in Congress to explain their condition, reply to accusations, and assist, by their local knowledge, in the perfecting of measures immediately affecting themselves. While the liberty of deliberation would then be free, and Congress would have full power to decide according to its judgment, there could be no objection urged that the States most interested had not been permitted to be heard. The principle is firmly fixed in the minds of the American people, that there should be no taxation without representation.

Great burdens have now to be borne by all the country, and we may best demand that they shall be borne without murmur when they are voted by a majority of the representatives of all the people. I would not interfere with the unquestionable right of Congress to judge, each House for itself, "of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," but that authority cannot be construed as including the right to shut out, in time of peace, any State from the representation to which it is entitled by the Constitution. At present, all the people of eleven States are excluded—those who were most faithful during the war not less than others. The State of Tennessee, for instance, whose authorities engaged in rebellion, was restored to all her constitutional relations to the Union by the patriotism and energy of her injured and betrayed people. Before the war was brought to a termination they had placed themselves in relations with the General Government, had established a State government of their own; as they were not included in the emancipation proclamation, they by their own act had amended their constitution so as to abolish slavery within the limits of their State. I know no reason why the State of Tennessee, for example, should not fully enjoy "all her constitutional relations to the United States."

The President of the United States stands toward the country in a somewhat different attitude from that of any member of Congress. Each member of Congress is chosen from a single district or State; the President is chosen by the people of all the States. As eleven are not at this time represented in either branch of Congress, it would seem to be his duty, on all proper occasions, to present their just claims to Congress. There always will be differences of opinion in the community, and individuals may be guilty of transgressions of the law; but these do not constitute valid objections against the right of a State to representation. I would in no wise interfere with the discretion of Congress with regard to the qualifications of members; but I hold it my duty to recommend to you, in the interests of peace and in the interests of union, the admission of every State to its share in public legislation, when, however insubordinate, insurgent, or rebellious its people may have been, it presents itself not only in an attitude of loyalty and harmony, but in the persons of Representatives whose loyalty cannot be questioned under any existing constitutional or legal test.

It is plain that an indefinite or permanent exclusion of any part of the country from representation must be attended by a spirit of disquiet and complaint. It is unwise and dangerous to pursue a course of measures which will unite a very large section of the country against another section of the country, however much the latter may preponderate. The course of emigration, the development of industry and business, and natural causes will raise up at the South men as devoted to the Union as those of any other part of the land. But if they are all excluded from Congress, if, in a permanent statute, they are declared not to be in full constitutional relations to the country, they may think they have cause to become a unit in feeling and sentiment against the Government. Under the political education of the American people the idea is inherent and ineradicable that the consent of the majority of the whole people is necessary to secure a willing acquiescence in legislation.

The bill under consideration refers to certain of the States as though they had not "been fully restored in all their constitutional relations to the United States." If they have not, let us at once act together to secure that desirable end at the earliest possible moment. It is hardly necessary for me to inform Congress that, in my own judgment, most of these States, so far at least as depends upon their own action, have already been fully restored, and are to be deemed as entitled to enjoy their constitutional rights as members of the Union. Reasoning from the Constitution itself, and from the actual situation of the country, I feel not only entitled, but bound, to assume that, with the Federal courts restored, and those of the several States in the full exercise of their functions, the rights and interests of all classes of the people will, with the aid of the military in cases of resistance to the laws, be essentially protected against unconstitutional infringement or violation. Should this expectation unhappily fail, which I do not anticipate, then the Executive is already fully armed with the powers conferred by the act of March, 1865, establishing the Freedmen's Bureau, and hereafter, as heretofore, he can employ the land and naval forces of the country to suppress insurrection or to overcome obstructions to the laws.

In accordance with the Constitution I return the bill to the Senate, in the earnest hope that a measure involving questions and interests so important to the country will not become a law unless, upon deliberate consideration by the people, it shall receive the sanction of an enlightened public judgment.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

The conclusion of the reading of the message was followed by loud applause and hisses in the galleries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will proceed to clear those portions of the galleries where disturbances were made.

Mr. SUMNER. Let the whole gallery be cleared.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All portions of the galleries where disturbances were made will be cleared, if those portions can be discriminated; otherwise, the whole galleries will be cleared.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose the bill which has been returned by the President is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Order must be restored by first clearing the galleries before public business can be proceeded with.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest whether, at this late period of the day's session, it is worth while to clear the galleries.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state to the Senator from Ohio that this is a repetition of the disturbance this afternoon. There was one disturbance in the gallery in the early part of the day, and notice was distinctly given that if it was repeated the galleries would be cleared. The public business of the country cannot be transacted if we are to be disturbed by the noise of the galleries; and after having given them notice, if the galleries will persist in making disturbance, I see no other way but to enforce the rule and clear them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the galleries cleared, unless otherwise directed by the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope only that portion will be cleared that created the disturbance.

The Sergeant-at-Arms, in pursuance of the order of the President pro tempore, proceeded to clear the western portion of the galleries.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It is now almost four o'clock, and there is a necessity for a brief executive session. ["No." "No."] Do you, gentlemen, expect to have a vote upon this bill to-night? ["Certainly."] I shall certainly desire to have the message printed first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill having been returned by the President of the United States with his objections, it becomes the duty of the Senate, this being the House in which the bill originated, to enter the objections at large upon their Journal and to proceed to reconsider the bill passed by them. It is the impression of the Chair that no vote of reconsideration is required, but the Senate proceed to reconsider the bill, and the question is taken whether the Senate will pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding, without any formal vote of reconsideration. The question therefore is, Shall the bill pass notwithstanding the objections of the President?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I now move that the message of the President, only a portion of which I have heard, being absent from the Chamber a part of the time, be printed for the use of the Senate, and that the vote on this bill be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock. It is but respectful to the President that that be done.

Mr. GRIMES. Is the motion susceptible of division?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. GRIMES. If so, I call for a division of the motion, so that the question shall first be put upon printing the message. I am perfectly satisfied that that shall be adopted; but let us proceed to the consideration of the bill now. I call for a division of the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question will first be on printing the message.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to say but one word. This is a message from the President of the United States, elected by the party holding the majority of this Senate. I am very anxious, so far as I am concerned, to preserve the unanimity, the union of the loyal party of the United States, the Republican Union party. I am anxious to read this message. I do not know what the custom of Congress has been, but my recollection is that heretofore these messages have been printed and that the vote has been taken after the message was laid upon the tables of Senators. I therefore hope that this message will be printed, and that the vote will be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. McDUGALL. I desire to say that the President of the United States is recognized, I think, by this body as such, and he has sent to us a message which has been delivered within the past hour. He has with great care and great courtesy asked the consideration of this body on this question, and I do not think there is any one of the members of this body who would, out of common respect to the President of the Republic, undertake to discuss it now until he had the opportunity of consideration. I think it would be a rudeness to him, and if rudeness is intended, let it be asserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the message of the President be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The residue of the motion is, that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. POLAND (when Mr. Foot's name was called) said: I desire to state that my colleague is detained by sickness and unable to be here.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stewart, Stockton, Van Winkle, and Willey—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark,

Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Foot, Henderson, Johnson, Norton, and Wright—5.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate, and the question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President notwithstanding?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move that the Senate do now adjourn, and on the motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Guthrie, Harris, Hendricks, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, Stockton, Van Winkle, and Willey—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Creswell, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cragin, Foot, Henderson, Johnson, Norton, and Wright—6.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. There are several Senators absent, and I think it but just to them that they should have an opportunity to be present when the vote is taken on this bill. I cannot consent, as long as I can postpone this question by the rules of the Senate, to have a vote upon it to-night. I therefore move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow at two o'clock, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stewart, Stockton, Van Winkle, and Willey—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Foot, Johnson, Norton, and Wright—4.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I think that the majority of the Senate ought, in propriety and magnanimity, to postpone the consideration of this question until to-morrow. The honorable Senator from Illinois who introduced the bill—

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the honorable Senator from Kentucky give way to me for a moment?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, before submitting a motion, I have a word to say, with the consent of the Senator from Kentucky. I have voted twice against the postponement of this question until to-morrow. I am prepared to give my vote upon it to-night; but when Senators here say they desire time to read so important a document as this, the time to consider and reflect upon the importance of the vote they are about to cast, I think it a very hard thing for us to refuse an adjournment.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I was not present when a portion of the message was read.

Mr. SHERMAN. The honorable Senator from Kansas, who is certainly a true friend to the cause in which we are engaged, says he has not heard this message. It seems to me it is rather hard to press a vote to-night, especially when the ordinary time of adjournment has arrived. I think a few hours' sober reflection will not do any of us any harm. It is manifest that to attempt to force a vote on this bill to-night would probably exhaust the strength of all of us. I do not believe it is possible to obtain a vote to-night. If four fifths of the Senate were in favor of it, they could not pass it to-night even against a minority of two or three.

Now, when the proposition is made by one of our own political friends to postpone this matter by an adjournment, so that it may come up to-morrow as unfinished business, I think we ought not to deny the motion. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn. This question, as I understand, will come up as the unfinished business to-morrow and will overrule the special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the rule of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. So that this bill will come up at one o'clock to-morrow and be the pending question. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 19, 1866.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Let the joint resolution be read.

It was read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the States of this Union which did not renounce their allegiance to the Federal Government during the late rebellion, but stood together maintaining the same in the face of the enemy through a war waged against the Union for the subversion of the Federal Constitution, are the only States clothed with legal power to consider and decide upon amendments to that Constitution; and that States which did, by their Legislatures, call conventions for the purpose of expressly denying allegiance to the Federal Constitution and Government, and did by such conventions ordain denial of such allegiance; and did, by their conventions, Legislatures, judiciaries, executives, and people turn over their State governments and powers, civil and military, to another and distinct nationality sought to be created, for the purpose of waging war against this Government; and did abrogate all State government as States of this Union; and did abdicate all government as in and of this Union; and did by their organizations and people wage war against this Government and people, until overthrown by force; and who are not now by their military power in the field against our armies, because force and means fail them to make further war; and whose people claim their lives as public enemies conquered in battle, are incompetent at law, and have no right in conscience to vote upon any amendment of the Federal Constitution, or otherwise act so as to affect the rights of loyal States, until first restored to full power in this Union by Congress; but that when any amendment shall be proposed by Congress and ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the loyal and recognized States, the same shall be taken and held thereafter as part of the Constitution of the United States for all purposes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to lay the joint resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order, under this call, to move to lay the joint resolution on the table. The gentleman can object to granting leave for its introduction, and that question will be decided by a vote of the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to leave being granted to introduce the joint resolution.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 78, nays 21.

So leave was granted; and the joint resolution was received, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

2. Resolved, That the safety, happiness, and prosperity of the people require that just and adequate penalties be annexed to the violation of law, and that those penalties be inflicted upon transgressors, not for the purpose of retaliation or revenge, but to insure subordination and obedience.

3. Resolved further, That we will stand by and sustain the President in executing the laws of the United States upon a sufficient number of leading rebels in each of the States lately in insurrection against the national Government to vindicate the majesty of the law, to sustain the confidence of loyal people, and warn the refractory for all time to come.

Resolved, That whenever the people of any State are thus "deprived of all civil government," it becomes the duty of Congress, by appropriate legislation, to enable them to organize a State government, and in the language of the Constitution to guaranty to such State a republican form of government.

Resolved, That it is the deliberate sense of this House that the condition of the rebel States fully justifies the President in maintaining the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in those States.

Resolved, That it is the deliberate sense of this House that the condition of the rebel States fully justifies the President in maintaining military possession and control thereof, and that the President is entitled to the thanks of the nation for employing the war power for the protection of Union citizens and the freedmen in those States.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. LE BLOND demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask for a separate vote on the first resolution.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I ask a separate vote on all of the resolutions.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. LE BLOND. I do not ask for the yeas and nays on each resolution, but on the entire proposition.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I make the point of order that, after the yeas and nays were ordered, it was not in order to call for a division.

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that any member may call for a division of a question susceptible of a division, before the main question is ordered.

Mr. BROOMALL, and Mr. LAWRENCE of Ohio, withdrew the demand for a division.

Mr. FINCK moved that the resolutions be laid upon the table.

Mr. LE BLOND demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RAYMOND. I wish to say, before demanding a division—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object to debate. The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 29, nays 119, not voting 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Brooks, Chanler, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Hogan, James M. Humphrey, Kerr, Le Blond, Marshall, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Taber, Thornton, Trimble, and Voorhees—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Dawes, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Lathin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McKuer, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Roussau, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Smith, Spaulding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—119.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Barker, Blow, Boyer, Brandegee, Buckland, Bundy, Culver, Darling, Davis, Defrees, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Harris, Hart, Hill, Hotchkiss, Edwin N. Hubbard, Johnson, Jones, Marston, Miller, Newell, Nocell, Sitgreaves, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Winfield, and Wright—34.

So the resolutions were not laid upon the table.

Pending the roll-call,

Mr. LOAN stated that his colleague, Mr. BLOW, was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. RAYMOND. I desire to ask a question. I will not trespass one minute.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object.

Mr. RAYMOND. Then I call for a division. I wished to ask a question which I thought might obviate the necessity of a division.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Well, I will hear that.

Mr. RAYMOND. I desire to ask—

Mr. LE BLOND. I object unless the gentlemen on the other side permit us on this side to offer our reasons why we vote against some of these resolutions. I am perfectly willing to extend the courtesy to the gentlemen on the other side if it is only extended to us on this side.

Mr. RAYMOND. If the gentleman will allow me to state my question, perhaps he will withdraw his objection.

Mr. LE BLOND. I have no doubt the gentleman has good reason for his action, but I insist upon the objection unless it is understood that we have the same courtesy extended to this side.

Mr. RAYMOND. I then ask to have a separate vote taken on the first two resolutions.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I will ask a separate vote on each one of them.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I demand the yeas and nays on the first.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, but the previous question has been seconded and the main question is now being put.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I raise the question whether the last resolution is not susceptible of division; it states two distinct propositions, and I call for a division of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

The yeas and nays were ordered on the adoption of the first resolution.

Mr. SMITH. I raise the question of order whether these resolutions should not go, under the rule, to the committee on reconstruction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined that question, and is of opinion that they would not go to that committee. But the point of order comes too late now after the previous question has been seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question was upon agreeing to the first resolution, which was as follows:

Resolved, That in the language of the proclamation of the President of May 29, 1865, "the rebellion which was waged by a portion of the people of the United States against the properly constituted authorities of the Government thereof in the most violent and revolting form, but whose organized and armed forces have now been almost entirely overcome, has in its revolutionary progress deprived the people" of the States in which it was organized "of all civil government."

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 36, not voting 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Defrees, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—102.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Brooks, Chanler, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Kerr, Latham, McCullough, Mercer, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, House-seau, Shanklin, Smith, Taber, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, and Whaley—36.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Barker, Blow, Buckland, Bundy, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Farquhar, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Hill, Hotchkiss, Edwin N. Lawrence, LeBlond, Marshall, Miller, Newell, Nocell, Patterson, Sawyer, Sitgreaves, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Voorhees, Winfield, and Wright—44.

So the first resolution was adopted.

The question was then upon agreeing to the second resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That whenever the people of any State are thus "deprived of all civil government," it becomes the duty of Congress, by appropriate legislation, to enable them to organize a State government, and in the language of the Constitution to guaranty to such State a republican form of government.

Mr. STEVENS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken on agreeing to the second resolution, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 104, nays 33, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Defrees, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, YEAS—Messrs. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Smith, Taber, Thornton, Trimble, and Whaley—83.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Barker, Blaine, Blow, Buckland, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Farquhar, Harris, Hart, Hill, Edwin N. Hubbell, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, Marshall, Marston, Miller, Newell, Noel, Patterson, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Robert L. Van Horn, Voorhees, Warner, Winfield, and Wright—45.

So the second resolution was adopted.

The question was then upon agreeing to the third resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the deliberate sense of this House that the condition of the rebel States fully justifies the President in maintaining the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in those States.

Mr. FINCK. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken on agreeing to the resolution, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 120, nays 26, not voting 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Dawes, De-frees, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Hale, Abner C. YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Brooks, Chandler, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, James M. Humphrey, Kerr, Le Blond, McCullough, Newell, Niblack, Radford, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Smith, Taber, Thornton, and Trimble—26.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Barker, Blow, Buckland, Bundy, Culver, Darling, Davis, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Harris, Hart, Hill, Hogan, Asahel W. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Johnson, Jones, Marshall, Miller, Nicholson, Noel, Samuel J. Randall, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Voorhees, Winfield, and Wright—36.

So the third resolution was adopted.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ORTH said that his colleague, Mr. DUMONT, was detained from his seat in consequence of serious illness.

The fourth resolution was again read, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the deliberate sense of this House that the condition of the rebel States fully justifies the President in maintaining military possession and control thereof, and that the President is entitled to the thanks of the nation for employing the war power for the protection of Union citizens and the freedmen in those States.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, demanded a division of the resolution.

The question was upon agreeing to the first clause of the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the deliberate sense of this House that the condition of the rebel States fully justifies the President in maintaining military possession and control thereof.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 117, nays 23, not voting 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Dawes, De-frees, Deming, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—117.

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Brooks, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, James M. Humphrey, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Taber, Thornton, and Trimble—23.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Barker, Blow, Buckland, Bundy, Chandler, Culver, Darling, Davis, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Dumont, Grider, Harris, Hart, Hill, Hogan, Asahel W. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Le Blond, Marshall, Miller, Morrill, Newell, Noel, Pike, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, Voorhees, Winfield, and Wright—42.

So the first branch of the resolution was agreed to.

After the roll-call was concluded,

Mr. DONNELLY said: I would have voted in favor of this branch of the resolution if I had been in my seat when my name was called.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the last branch of the resolution, as follows:

And that the President is entitled to the thanks of the nation for employing the war power for the protection of Union citizens and the freedmen in those States.

Mr. BANKS called the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 134, nays 8, not voting 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Reader W. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—134.

YEAS—Messrs. Grider, Aaron Harding, McCullough, Nicholson, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, and Trimble—8.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Barker, Blow, Buckland, Bundy, Chandler, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Grinnell, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Asahel W. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Johnson, Jones, Marshall, McRuer, Miller, Newell, Niblack, Noel, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, Voorhees, Winfield, and Wright—10.

So the last branch of the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. UPSON moved to reconsider the various votes by which the House agreed to the several resolutions; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MONEYS FROM REBEL STATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the House of February 7, 1865, a tabular statement of the moneys paid into the Treasury since April 1, 1865, to date, by the States lately in rebellion; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, submitted the following resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Resolved, That five hundred and fifty extra copies of the report on the commercial relations of the United States with foreign nations for the year 1865 be printed for the use of the State Department.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote on agreeing to the resolution just adopted. I make this motion for the purpose of asking a question of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LAFLIN.]

I observe that the resolution provides only for the printing of a certain number of copies of the report on commercial relations for the use of the State Department. The resolution which I introduced provided for the printing of the usual number of extra copies for the use of members of the House. I would like the gentleman to state why the resolution, as reported, does not provide for furnishing any copies of this document to the House. So far as I am individually concerned, I am not particular about having any copies printed for the use of the House; but I do not see why the number specified in the resolution should be printed for the use of the State Department, while none are printed for this House.

Mr. LAFLIN. Mr. Speaker, of every document ordered to be printed by the House fifteen hundred and fifty copies are required by law to be printed. That is the regular number. In addition to that, the law provides for printing extra copies of certain documents. By the law it is provided that of the reports of the Secretary of State on the commercial relations of the United States with foreign countries there shall be printed two thousand copies for Senators, three thousand for Representatives, and four hundred and fifty for the State Department. But, sir, the State Department desires for its own use, inasmuch as there are nine hundred officials who require this work, a thousand copies. In order to meet the deficiency the committee have reported in favor of printing five hundred and fifty extra copies for the State Department, making one thousand copies. The matter now stands in this way: there will be printed for the use of the members of this House three thousand copies, and for the use of the State Department one thousand copies.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That explanation is entirely satisfactory. I now move that my motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS OF MR. BANCROFT.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, also reported the following resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of members of this House twenty thousand extra copies of the memorial address of Hon. George Bancroft, and the proceedings thereon, on the death of the late President Lincoln, delivered before the two Houses of Congress and their invited guests, on the 12th instant.

Mr. ROGERS. I move to amend by adding "the Dred Scott decision."

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order at this time.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, which was upon agreeing to the resolution.

The question being taken, there were, on a division—yeas 74, noes 18.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote on agreeing to the resolution; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTER-CONTINENTAL TELEGRAPH.

Mr. BANKS. I ask the leave of the House to present a joint resolution relating to the completion of telegraphic communication between the western and eastern continents. It is important that the coming season should be appropriated to this work; I therefore propose to ask the consideration of this resolution at the present time. I ask that it may be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read the joint resolution. It recites in the preamble the provisions of the act of July 1, 1864, on the same subject, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to detail a vessel to assist in surveys and soundings, laying down submarine cable, transporting materials connected therewith, and generally afford such assistance as may be deemed best calculated to secure a successful prosecution of the enterprise.

The preamble further recites that the Emperor of Russia, for the purpose of coöperating with the Government of the United States under the act of 1864, has ordered a steam corvette, the Variay, of two thousand one hundred and fifty-six tons burden, seventeen guns, and three hundred and six men, to be placed subject to the orders of the telegraph company; and that the company intend during the ensuing summer to lay the submarine cable required at Behring's straits, the cable and the material for the entire line being now in transit, and the vessels of the company, seven in number, being ready at San Francisco and Vancouver, and requiring immediate coöperation on the part of the United States in conformity with the act referred to.

The resolution, therefore, authorizes and requires the Secretary of the Navy to detail one steam vessel from the squadron of the Pacific station to assist in making surveys and soundings in that part of the Pacific coast both of America and Asia where it is proposed to establish said telegraph, in laying the submarine cable, in transporting materials connected therewith, and generally to afford such assistance as may be best calculated to secure the success of the enterprise and to carry out the purposes of the act of July 1, 1864, entitled "An act to encourage and facilitate telegraphic communication between the eastern and western continents."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Massachusetts does not propose to act upon that now without further consideration.

Mr. BANKS. Of course I desire it to be considered now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not propose to legislate for the benefit of a telegraph or any other company in this way—to put our Navy under its orders.

Mr. BANKS. The resolution is nearly a transcript of the second section of the act of 1864, except that this requires the Secretary of the Navy to furnish this vessel, instead of placing it at his discretion, as the act of 1864 did. We were at war with the insurgent States. If action is to be taken, it should be disposed of early this season. If the House is not disposed to decide the question to-day, let it be introduced, so it shall take its place next after the Pennsylvania contested-election case.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. BANKS. I move, then, that the rules be suspended.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish to ask a question in reply to a remark of the gentleman from Illinois. What difference is there whether this United States vessel shall idly cruise off the coast of California or be ordered to the discharge of this service?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have good reason for my objection. It would cost a great deal more to send out a vessel for this purpose than to keep one cruising there. I am opposed to directing the Secretary of the Navy to put a naval vessel at the disposal of any company, telegraph or otherwise.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, one word.

Last year we authorized the Secretary of the Navy to send one of our ships to the Pacific coast to aid this company in the great enterprise of laying this most important line of telegraph. The Russian Government at once ordered one of its vessels to attend the laying down of the line so far as its coast went. It went further, and ordered one of its vessels to coöperate with the vessel which we authorized, as that Government said, that the two flags of Russia and the United States might mingle in the execution of this great work. Our order is still out; but some clerk in the Navy Department says, notwithstanding that object is plain upon its face, yet it does not use the word "required," but the word "authorized," in the ordinary way, and it will not grant it. I hope we will allow the legitimate construction of the act to be carried out. We have a vast number of vessels now doing nothing.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This is to amend the act of last Congress?

Mr. STEVENS. This is to say required instead of authorized.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the House will not agree to it.

Mr. BANKS. Pending the motion to suspend the rules, I ask the gentleman from Illinois to allow me to make a single suggestion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. When the rules are suspended and it comes in we can then discuss it on both sides.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 97, noes 9.

So the rules were suspended.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a single suggestion in reply to the gentleman from Illinois.

This is one of the grandest enterprises of the age; and all that is asked of the United States is that our Government shall furnish a vessel to carry the flag of our country during the operation of laying the submarine telegraph line. There are two hundred thousand miles of telegraph in Europe and Asia, and one hundred thousand miles here, making three hundred thousand miles. It is necessary to connect these lines by a submarine cable at Behring's straits. This great line is completed except about twenty-five hundred miles, twelve or fifteen hundred miles in Asia and ten or twelve hundred on the American side. It will probably be completed this summer, certainly in 1867.

It is an American enterprise. Mr. Collins is the author of the enterprise; is a native of New York and a citizen of New York; and Colonel Bulkeley, with whom I served three years in the Army of the United States, the engineer charged with the execution of the work, is a citizen of New York. He is one of the most patriotic, courageous, and capable men I have known, and has few if any superiors in this country as a telegraphic engineer. In his hands it is certain to be successful. The enterprise will be completed this summer, at the farthest in 1867. The Secretary of the Navy will through this enterprise be able at any moment to communicate with his vessels at any naval station upon the face of the earth. All we ask is he shall allow the flag of the United States to attend our engineers and workmen in the completion of the work. The Emperor of Russia has given his whole heart to the success of the enterprise, and has voluntarily granted the use of a first-class vessel-of-war, as stated in the preamble; the British Government has granted everything required; and the United States Government has given everything except that which we now ask. I demand the previous question.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKS. I will.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. If I understand the resolution correctly, I think it limits the vessels that may be detailed for this service to the Pacific squadron. I would inquire whether my colleague knows that there is a suitable vessel there, and suggest whether it would not be expedient to enlarge the scope of the resolution sufficiently to send a proper vessel fitted for this work from any quarter.

Mr. BANKS. I understood there were vessels proper for this service on the Pacific side. I have no objection, however, to modifying the resolution by adding after the words "Pacific squadron" the words "or elsewhere."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the previous question for a moment.

Mr. BANKS. I do not wish to open a general debate; if the gentleman wants to make a suggestion I will withdraw it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish to make this suggestion in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts. This is a corporation which has been established for the purpose of building these telegraph lines. It is entirely a private matter. Congress at the last session placed this matter at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, and in the exercise of a very wise judgment, in my opinion, he declined to allow any vessel to be appropriated to this use. Now this corporation comes here and asks Congress to direct the Secretary of the Navy to place this vessel at its disposal, and the people of the United States are now asked to pay the expenses which this telegraph company should itself pay. That is just what it amounts to.

It is suggested that it is not going to cost any more to have this vessel go upon this expedition than it would to have it lie idle. That suggestion cannot be sustained. I make the prediction that we shall involve this Government in an expense of $50,000 by the passage of this joint resolution. If the House is prepared to do this, it may do so; for one I am opposed to it.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me for two or three words only?

Mr. BANKS. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKS. This is not a mere corporation. If it were I would not vote for it on that ground. The Government and the world are to act through the agency of this telegraph. It is a great act of civilization. It is stretching out the American continent to the Old World through the only successful route, and above all it is the only means of reaching the only European Power that is favorable to the people of the United States. It is indispensably necessary, therefore, situated as we are with regard to France and England, forthwith by telegraph to connect ourselves with Russia, our only friend in Europe.

Mr. BANKS. I have only a word more to say, and then I shall call the previous question. This is not strictly private enterprise. It is one in which the whole world is interested. It is true that it is effected through the agency of a corporation, as many other great works are, but it is sustained and will succeed through the assistance of Governments. If the Navy Department of this country has no interest in such a question as this, the people have. It puts us in communication with five hundred million people—the Russians and Chinese—who are friendly to us, and who are the only friends we have in the Old World. And in effecting communication with these friendly nations we dwarf in the future whatever of the European Powers that are hostile to us. Upon that consideration alone this enterprise is one of purely public character, and should be so regarded by every member of this House. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the amendment to add after the words "Pacific station," the words "or elsewhere," and it was agreed to.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was read the third time.

The question then was on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. BANKS. I demand the previous question on the passage.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the House reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and that that motion be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MEXICAN LOAN.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to have the following resolution considered at this time:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, at as early a day as practicable, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interests, any correspondence or other information in his possession or on file in the State Department having relation to any steps taken by the republican Government of Mexico directed to the negotiation of a loan in the United States for the purpose of procuring means to sustain that republic in its effort to maintain its independence.

Mr. RADFORD. I object.

INCOME TAX OF UNMARRIED MEN.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making such an amendment to the internal revenue law as will not allow the same amount of exemption from taxation to a single man as to a householder and a man having a family, and that they be permitted to report by bill or otherwise.

NAVY-YARD IN CONNECTICUT.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution to be considered at this time:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the advantages of a site offered to the Government upon the river Thames, near New London, Connecticut, for naval purposes, and to report upon the expediency of accepting the same for the purpose of establishing thereat a navy-yard or naval station for the construction, repair, or laying up in ordinary iron-clad or other naval vessels, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CHANLER. I object.

CATTLE DISEASE.

Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the spread of foreign diseases among the cattle of the United States," approved December 18, 1865, and ask for its consideration at this time.

Mr. RADFORD. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that the act to prevent the spread of foreign diseases among the cattle of the United States, approved December 18, 1865, be amended so as to provide that the importation of neat cattle and of hides of neat cattle from any foreign country into the United States shall be prohibited; provided that the operation of this act, or any part thereof, may be suspended as to any foreign country or countries, or any parts of such country or countries, whenever the Secretary of the Treasury shall officially determine and give public notice thereof that such importation will not tend to the introduction or spread of contagious or infectious disease among the cattle of the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and empowered, and it shall be his duty to make all the necessary orders and regulations to carry this law into effect or to suspend the same as therein provided, and to send copies thereof to the proper officers in the United States, and to such officers or agents of the United States in foreign countries as he shall judge necessary.

The second section provides that the President of the United States, whenever in his judgment the importation of neat cattle and of hides of neat cattle may be made without danger of the introduction or spread of any contagious or infectious disease among the cattle of the United States, may by proclamation declare the provisions of this act to be inoperative, and the same shall be afterward inoperative and of no effect, from and after thirty days from the date of said proclamation.

Section three provides that any person convicted of an unlawful violation of any provision of this act shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

No objection was made to the introduction of the bill.

The bill was then read a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I ask leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. MILLER, for several days.

Leave was accordingly granted.

The SPEAKER. I am requested to ask leave of absence for Mr. LE BLOND for two weeks.

Leave was accordingly granted.

PAY OF OFFICERS IMPROPERLY DISMISSED.

Mr. ECKLEY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be requested to inquire into the expediency of providing for payment and allowance to meritorious officers who, while in service during the war of the rebellion were summarily dismissed without trial, and reinstated upon proper showing; said payment and allowance to cover the period from their dismissal until their restoration; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. DAWES presented, from the Committee of Elections, a report on the contested-election case of Washburn vs. Voorhees, accompanied with the following resolutions, which were read:

Resolved, That Hon. Daniel W. Voorhees is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the seventh district of Indiana in the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

Resolved, That Henry D. Washburn is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the seventh congressional district of Indiana, in the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

The report, with the accompanying resolutions, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to state that this report will, I suppose, be printed and ready for the perusal of members to-morrow. I wish to call it up for action on Wednesday, inasmuch as there will probably be no session of the House on Thursday, the 22d, and the business of the committee is such that they cannot attend to the matter on Friday. I hope that members will, by reading the report, relieve the committee of any necessity for consuming the time of the House in extended discussion. I shall be glad to have the action of the House upon the question without much debate.

PENNSYLVANIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. UPSON. I rise to a question of privilege, and call up the resolutions reported by the majority of the Committee of Elections on the contested-election case from the sixteenth congressional district of Pennsylvania. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] desires to address the House. I give notice that when he shall have closed I shall call the previous question, unless some gentleman shall desire to reply to him.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman will give me about ten minutes.

Mr. UPSON. Certainly.

The following are the resolutions reported by the majority of the committee:

Resolved, That Alexander H. Coffroth, upon the certificates and papers relating to the election in the sixteenth congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania, has the prima facie right to the vacant seat from that district, and is entitled to take the oath of office and occupy a seat in this House as the Representative in Congress from said district, without prejudice to the right of William H. Koontz, claiming to have been duly elected thereto, to contest his right to said seat upon the merits.

Resolved, That William H. Koontz, desiring to contest the right of Hon. Alexander H. Coffroth to a seat in this House as a Representative from the sixteenth district of the State of Pennsylvania, be, and he is, required to serve upon the said Coffroth, within fifteen days after the passage of this resolution, a particular statement of the grounds of said contest, and that the said Coffroth be, and he is hereby, required to serve upon the said Koontz his answer thereto within fifteen days thereafter, and that both parties be allowed sixty days next after the service of said answer to take testimony in support of their several allegations and denials, notice of intention to examine witnesses to be given to the opposite party at least five days before their examination, but neither party to give notice of taking testimony within less than five days between the close of taking it at one place and its commencement at another, but in all other respects in the manner prescribed in the act of February 19, 1851.

The pending question was upon the motion of Mr. PAINE to amend the resolutions submitted by the majority of the committee, by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That William H. Koontz has the prima facie right to a seat in this House as a Representative of the sixteenth congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That Alexander H. Coffroth, desiring to contest the right of William H. Koontz to a seat as Representative of the sixteenth congressional district, be required to serve upon the said Koontz, within fifteen days after the adoption of this resolution, a particular statement of the grounds of said contest; and that the said Koontz be required to serve upon the said Coffroth his answer thereto within fifteen days thereafter; and that both parties be allowed sixty days next after the service of said answer to take testimony in support of their several allegations and denials; notices of proposed examinations of witnesses to be given at least five days before such examinations; no such examination to be commenced at one place before the expiration of five days from the conclusion of the last examination at another place; such examinations to be regulated in all other respects by the provisions of the act of February 19, 1851.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. UPSON] has not stated the matter with precise accuracy in saying that I desire to address the House. I really desired very much to avoid speaking on the question, as I am confident that the House now feels weary of the subject. Gentlemen, however, whose interests are closely involved, are particularly desirous that I shall say something on the question, and I yield to them. I shall attempt to condense my remarks into the smallest possible compass consistently with the proper presentation of the points which strike me as important. And, Mr. Speaker, I think that this case, like almost every other case, turns upon two or three points. It is true that other matters connect themselves with these points, and will have to be looked at.

This is a case in which five counties compose the congressional district, the sixteenth district of Pennsylvania. In relation to three of those five counties there is no dispute or difference among the members of the committee. In order to get at the truth, then, we need only look at two of those counties, Adams and Bedford. Here, Mr. Speaker, let me attract, if I can, the attention of members to that which appears to my mind a controlling idea in this case: that, if you count all the votes that are returned to this House by official, and, as I deem, legal papers, there is no controversy in the case, and Mr. Koontz is entitled to the seat, because he received more votes than his antagonist, as indicated by the legal papers in the case. The whole question is, whether this House is in such a predicament that it dare not look at the papers in the case, whether, in other words, there has been got here by some process of technics such a state of things that the House of Representatives cannot get beyond a certain paper blockade and find out the truth upon official papers in the case?

Now, how does that happen? In just this way: it is said that there is here a certain return, made by what is called the district board of this sixteenth district, which return concludes Congress and prevents us from looking at those other papers which show that Mr. Koontz is elected.

Now, sir, that is a proposition which to my mind is utterly untenable and wrong, wrong in fact and wrong in that there is no legal principle upon which it can be rested.

Let us look at that a moment. The resolution referring this matter to us directs us to find who has the prima facie title. What does that mean? I will state it in a sentence. It means, not that this House shall drift along and lodge upon the first paper which comes up, to wit, the return of the district board; but it means this House shall look at all the legal papers before it and find out who has received the largest number of votes. Now, sir, there is under the Pennsylvania laws, as disclosed in this case, but one judicial tribunal to determine who shall not vote; and that judicial tribunal are the judges who, under the law of Pennsylvania, decide when a man is entitled to vote or when he is not.

Sir, when that board has acted on the matter, and it has been received, then the vote has accomplished its high prerogative; it is then the determination and voice of the American constituent, and this Congress in finding out the question who has the prima facie title has nothing else to do than to cast up from the papers which show these votes admitted by this board of judges the whole number of them, and give the seat to him who has the most votes as shown by all the papers in the case, which are papers provided by law to show the number of these votes. To make that count is to find the prima facie title.

Mr. Speaker, under the act of Congress there is no prima facie case proved by any paper. That act of Congress reads thus:

"Before the first meeting of the next Congress, and of every subsequent Congress, the Clerk of the next preceding House of Representatives shall make a roll of the Representatives-elect and place thereon the names of all persons, and all such persons only, whose credentials show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States respectively, or the laws of the United States."

Now, sir, no such credential as that is in this case. The Governor's proclamation announcing the election of members from the State of Pennsylvania would be such a credential. The Governor found there was no such return made to him as would permit him to issue that proclamation. Now, there is only one other possible credential which is known to the laws of Pennsylvania which could be such a credential as that contemplated by the act of Congress, and that is the paper which the district board is required to send to the person elected, or decided to be elected by that district board. Such a paper is said to be in this case. It is paper No. 16. Let me say to the House that the paper in this case, even if we were bound to stop upon it, even if I were mistaken in the proposition I announced a month ago, to wit, that Congress can look at all the papers before it, even though the certificate of the district board were in form perfect, and that there is no legal order in which we must take up the papers; even if I were wrong in that, and though we cannot go past a return legal in form, and count, as I insist we may, the returns from the election precincts; if we must on the contrary stop at the return of this district board, were it in due form, then still there is nothing in this case to prevent Congress from going back to those elementary returns, because this credential, which I say is the only other possible credential in the meaning of the act of Congress, the return made by the district board, is amenable to the following fatal objections: first, that it is confronted by another return, to wit, paper 15, on page 36 of the report, shows that Coffroth's certificate was based on a count which did not include all the counties of the district, but in fact excluded Somerset. Secondly, it is on its own face not in compliance with the law.

On that return held by Mr. Coffroth it is not indicated, as indeed the fact was not, that they had counted all the counties of the district, and on the face of that paper they professed to count only such as were before them. So that paper does not profess to comply with the law. And that is not all, nor the worst of it. Another paper in the case shows that they actually did reject or omit to count one county of the district. Now, I ask gentlemen, before saying they are bound by that return, to pause and look at the consequences a little.

Mr. RADFORD. Will the gentleman state why they did not count that one county?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Certainly I will in the course of my remarks. They did not count one county, namely, Somerset. That fact is shown by their own return. They say so on the face of the paper. They say in their return to the secretary of state that they have not counted Somerset. Now, sir, is that return good for anything in law? The law says that they shall count all the votes cast. They say that they did not count Somerset. Will you say that that is such a return as concludes Congress?

Look, as I said a moment ago, at the consequences of that. There are five counties in my district. Four of those counties give me say 6,000 majority; but one, to wit, the county in which Columbus is situated, Franklin, has changed the result in one past election. Now, suppose that by sickness, by accident, by a bridge being swept away, or by some other unavoidable event, that county has not sent in its returns to the place of meeting where the returns are counted. The returns of the other four counties are counted, leaving out Franklin, and I am declared elected; whereas if the county of Franklin had been counted, it would have changed the result. And then it is gravely said to the House of Representatives that the papers are conclusive upon Congress. Why, sir, it seems to me simply preposterous.

And that brings me to the question suggested by my colleague on the committee, why Somerset county was not counted. The majority of the committee have referred to that in what seems to me to be a very singular argument. It was not counted, it is said, because the gentleman who represented that county absented himself. He was notified to attend and did not attend, and a majority of the committee use this expression:

"It is now claimed on behalf of Mr. Koontz that this voluntary neglect of duty on the part of his friend, the return judge of Somerset county, shall be made to redound to his benefit, and that he shall in fact be placed in a better position than if said judge had done his duty."

Mr. RADFORD. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. SHELLABARGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RADFORD. I want to ask him whether or not it appears, from the report of the committee, that the gentleman who absented himself was in town at that time, and that he was a friend of Mr. Koontz.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I take the statement I have just read from the report as true, that he was a political friend of Mr. Koontz; and I take it he was in town. I consider that it makes no conceivable difference as to what was the duty of the board, nor as to the invalidity of their action after they had excluded this county from their count.

Now, suppose we assume that it is possible for Mr. Koontz and the return officer for Somerset county to confederate together, if you please—a thing that is not claimed in this case—to absent themselves and deprive the board of the presence of that return. Will any gentleman in this House now get up and say that that will change the result of an election in any congressional district? Dare any gentleman here maintain that the fault of anybody in failing to bring in a county shall be held to change the result of an election by the people? Is the choice of the people to be defeated in order to punish the judge of Somerset for confederating to not bring it in? I reply to my friends of the majority of this committee, the law knows no friend of Mr. Koontz in this official duty which the return judge of Somerset has to pass upon and to discharge. I say that the law recognizes no such relation as that in the discharge of this official duty, and to punish Mr. Koontz and his friend will not defeat the election of the people.

Mr. RADFORD. I will not interrupt the gentleman again if he will answer me one question. In regard to the returns which that gentleman from Somerset county had in his pocket, if the candidate had gone in on that count on that day what would have been the result?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I will answer that if the gentleman will bear with me until I come to one after another of the suggestions. Now, my proposition is this: that the law of Pennsylvania requires this district board to count the votes of all the counties; that anything less than that is not a compliance with the law; that that is shown by the return itself not to have been done; that therefore the return is insignificant in law; and hence, just as the attorney general and the Governor of Pennsylvania decided, it was rejected as good for nothing.

Then we have these ideas, which I beg to impress upon any gentleman who desires information in regard to this question:

First, that the Governor of the State decided that this district return, in which Somerset county was omitted, was worthless, and could not be made the predicate of his action.

Second, that that opinion was based upon the opinion of Mr. Meredith, the attorney general of the State of Pennsylvania.

Third, that that is a return made in express, direct, and palpable violation, or rather disregard, of the requirements of the laws of Pennsylvania, which require that that board shall count all the votes given.

Fourth, that if you permit the sweeping away of a bridge or the sickness of a return judge or any other accident to deprive the people of their choice, and make a return binding which is made in absence of that part of the district kept out by such accident, then you have put it into the power of bad men, as well as of an accident, to change the result in any election in any congressional district in the United States; and Fifth, that there is no such practical difficulty in the case as the majority of the committee suggest, to wit, that the vote of Somerset county could not be had. It could be had, at any rate upon a contest, or an inquiry into the merits of the case which would reach to and bring up the returns of the precincts.

And far better than to permit a man by absentsing himself to change the result in any congressional district, will it be to have no return at all, and let the body that has the control of the question, whether it be court or House of Representatives, send for the evidence that will show who is elected.

This report of the board is a mere instrumentality, a mere method of getting at the truth. Then why take a position which will enable a bad man to change the result rather than resort to that other expedient to await the sending for and procuring the returns that lie back of this return of the board.

Now, I come to the question last asked by my colleague, [Mr. RADFORD,] as to what would have been the consequence if this man from Somerset had gone into the board. Now, that is a very pertinent question; and it is one that it is exceedingly easy to answer. Had he gone into the board, as it was then constituted and convened, with the kind of returns that they had there, and had the return of Somerset county been counted in with those that were there on that day, then the result would have been a small majority for Mr. Coffroth.

Mr. RADFORD. Ah!

Mr. SHELLABARGER. But the trouble with the conclusion to which my friend seeks to arrive is just this: that that board had, previous to the meeting, been guilty, if not of conspiracy, as has been charged, to defeat the choice of the people, at least had been guilty of a gross violation of the law, and had fixed up the returns of two counties in such a way as to commit at least a fraud against Mr. Koontz.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I will, certainly.

Mr. DAWES. I want to give my colleague on the committee [Mr. SHELLABARGER] an opportunity to answer this point right here. He says that the district judges who composed that board had been guilty, previous to that, of what he calls a conspiracy.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I did not say that. I said that had been charged.

Mr. DAWES. Very well; it is charged that they had been guilty of a conspiracy in fixing up the returns. I suggest to him now, as a lawyer, to say in all fairness if that is not a question of fact to be proved on evidence in the trial of the case on its merits, and not in the trial of a case on the prima facie evidence? I would like to hear him answer that question.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Now, that is a very pertinent question, and one I would as lief answer now as at any other time, and I will answer in a way which it seems to me will commend itself to the convictions and approval of the gentleman from Massachusetts; that if it were a question of fraud relating to the admission of a vote, then it would be a question to be contested on the merits; but if it be a fraud or a conspiracy or a blunder—and observe, Mr. Speaker, I am not saying that it was either, it is utterly immaterial for the purposes of this case which it was, it comes to the same thing—it is not only competent for this House, but it is the duty of this House, to see by a count and inspection of all the legal returns of votes which are before Congress, whether those judges that met at Gettysburg assumed judicial powers which they did not possess and threw out the legal returns of a part of the townships or military precincts of the counties of Bedford and Adams; and if they did violate the law and assumed powers which did not belong to them, and met there after having rejected enough of the legal returns of the townships to change the result, and invited Somerset to come in, then I say, Somerset did right in not coming in. This rejection of legal returns is shown by the very papers on which the majority rely to make out their prima facie case, and it is not going into the merits to find the blunder or fraud when they appear on the very paper which Mr. Coffroth relies on to make out his case. His case shows the illegality of this alleged prima facie title paper. I say, that when the conspiracy or fraud or blunder consists in arbitrarily rejecting part of the votes of Bedford and Adams counties, that is a conspiracy or fraud or blunder into which we are bound to look, because the papers themselves disclose it and it in turn invalidates the papers which it taints. And here is just where we part. My friend insists that we shall shut our eyes and be stone-blind here as to what is the truth in reference to the number of votes excluded by the returns. And this although the papers themselves show the illegal exclusion.

Mr. DAWES. My friend does not quite understand me. I understood our duty to be to look at the papers without evidence. What my friend has stated here is a charge made on one side and denied on the other. The only manner in which the committee or anybody else could ascertain whether that charge was false or true was by hearing evidence. But my friend and his colleagues, the minority of the committee, assume that the charge made as a justification for this man is true, while the majority of the committee do not assume it to be either true or false, but say that it is an issue of fact, upon which testimony should be taken on the one side and on the other; and as the truth may turn out on the merits of the case, so we ought to find.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, my friend is again slightly in error as to a matter of fact; and in that slight error of fact he gets entirely into a vice as to the legal position and conclusions at which he arrives. His error consists in overlooking this fact: that neither the majority nor the minority of this committee have adhered to the papers and said that they would look at no fact outside of them. Sir, thereport which I am now combatting is supported on its face by extrinsic evidence, as will be seen by reference to the second page. Because the return in favor of Mr. Coffroth is not upon its face as good as the return in favor of Mr. Koontz, the majority of the committee have resorted to outside evidence in order to show that the men who signed the paper of Mr. Koontz were not judges.

So I say here, that it is not traveling out of the sphere indicated by the resolution referring this subject matter to us, to ascertain, not by general parole evidence, but by certified papers filed in this case, the fact that these men who met there at the meeting of the district board representing four counties, had in their county boards rejected the soldiers' votes for reasons that were utterly frivolous. Let me mention one instance now, lest I forget it hereafter. There was one case in which a man living in Franklin county had voted along with fifty or sixty men from Adams county. The Adams county return was right in every particular; but because that one man from another county had voted along with the men from Adams county they rejected the whole return. This is a specimen of the way in which they get Mr. Coffroth elected, and this appears, not by outside evidence, but by the papers which contribute in part to make up the alleged title of Mr. Coffroth.

Now, sir, when such papers as these brought before the Committee of Elections show that those men had in their county boards arbitrarily and in violation of the express provisions of law assumed a jurisdiction they were prohibited from assuming, and rejected soldiers' votes, and had thus put the district returns into such a condition as that if Somerset had come in it would be only walking into a snare, then I allege that it was the duty of Somerset to stay out of that meeting and defeat the consummation of a great wrong. I will, on this point, read a sentence from an opinion given in this case. True, it was given by counsel, counsel for Mr. Koontz, a counsel, however, exceedingly eminent in the law, who certainly states it as well as I could, and I think a great deal better. I mean my idea in regard to the effect in law of the conduct of these men upon their ability to make any binding or valid count or return at Chambersburg after they had in the county boards so violated the law in making up the returns of Adams and Bedford counties. It is from the opinion of Judge Black, of Pennsylvania. Here it is:

"I maintain that where the majority of a county election board transcends its merely ministerial duty of counting the votes, undertakes to decide the legality of the township returns by throwing out a part of them, and so provokes a split with those who cannot concur, the proceeding becomes revolutionary, and the power of the body to give any certificate at all is destroyed."

I say any court, I do not care whether it is this one, the highest court of the nation, or the lowest court of the people, could hold that a board whose powers are merely to add up votes shall be tolerated in first exercising the high judicial power of deciding that the returns of enough of the soldiers' votes are illegal and shall be rejected to change the result in the district, and then that these men shall be permitted to bring into a district board what they have left of the returns, and upon these illegal county board returns make up a valid count and return for the district binding upon all men and this House.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have not had an opportunity of knowing anything about this case except from the rumors we have heard. I desire to inquire whether Judge Black appeared as counsel before the Committee of Elections.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. No, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. I inquire whether it is not known to the gentleman, as a member of that committee, as well as to other members of the committee, that that opinion which comes from Judge Black is a newspaper article, written for the benefit of his friend and relative Mr. Koontz?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I read it because it is good sense. I will say, whether it comes from Judge Black or not, it is right; and I read it because it was right and not because it is authority.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Allow me to say that was a legal opinion given by Judge Black, written by him on this particular case and signed by him and sent to the committee.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. And let me add, for which no doubt he was well paid.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I yield to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. SCOFIELD.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to say to my colleague from Pennsylvania further in answer to that question that Judge Black, in connection with one on this floor, said he had given it a great deal of time and consideration, and it was an opinion he was willing to stand by as applicable to all cases coming up under the law of Pennsylvania, and for all time.

Mr. DAWES. Did he also tell my colleague on the committee how much he got for it?

Mr. SCOFIELD. No, sir. I will say, furthermore, that I am politically hostile to Judge Black. Everybody in our State, Democrat and Republican, who has practiced under him as judge of the supreme court will say he is as pure a man as the chairman of the Committee of Elections, and he is as pure a man, in my judgment, as we have.

Mr. DAWES. Allow me to say I did not mean to say it would be anything but pure on the part of Judge Black to take a retainer and pay for a professional opinion. My friend has been in the profession long enough to know that I did not impute anything against his honesty for taking a retainer and pay for writing an opinion in behalf of a client and appearing before the committee to advocate it.

Mr. STEVENS. Does my friend insinuate—

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman will not put an insinuation into my mouth in order to answer it.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose when he asked if that opinion was not the result of a fee, he meant to insinuate that lawyers taking a fee would give a legal opinion different from their sound judgment of the law, or else that question has no significance.

Mr. DAWES. I made no such insinuation. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is too clear-headed to have supposed I did. But it is as good a way to answer a point as any—and the gentleman from Pennsylvania knows it better than anybody else in this House—to put words into a man's mouth and then answer the words he has put in.

Mr. STEVENS. What did you mean?

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman knows that I meant this: that attorneys that appear before committees to advocate the cause of their clients advocate it in the best way they can; and it is no more proper to bring into this House the opinion of Judge Black, prepared to be presented before the committee in support of the claim of his client, and say that it is an independent opinion of a judge than it is to bring in an opinion of the counsel on the other side which was brought to match it. It is precisely the same thing.

Mr. RADFORD. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] one question.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I think I had better decline. There will be plenty of time after I get through.

Mr. RADFORD. A single question.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. If it is such an accommodation to the gentleman, I will yield.

Mr. RADFORD. I desire to ask my associate on the committee [Mr. SCOFIELD] whether in his own judgment he believes that opinion of Judge Black to be an honest one, upon the information he has given to others.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Why, certainly I think so.

Mr. RADFORD. All right.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Now, Mr. Speaker, the House that has done me the favor of listening to me will bear me witness that I introduced this extract from Judge Black with the careful statement that he was counsel for Mr. Koontz, and I adopted it not as authority, but as a better way of expressing my own ideas than I would perhaps be able to find.

Now, the point I have attained is this; four men have met at Chambersburg to count the vote of the sixteenth district. Before coming there they have, in what Judge Black calls a revolutionary proceeding, rejected enough soldiers' votes so that if Somerset should come in with the others, the man whom they desired to elect, as indicated by their rejection of the soldiers' votes, would still be elected although Somerset came in. Now, then, my colleague must not get up and say to me that had Somerset come in it would not have changed the result; because the wrong is in the fact that they have been guilty of this revolutionary conduct before they met there, and have put themselves in a position where they have no right under the law of Pennsylvania to make a count. But, sir, they may well meet there now, having excluded enough votes to change the result with Somerset in arbitrarily in violation of law—they may well invite Somerset to come in and serve a notice on her to come—

"Won't you come into my parlor, says the spider to the fly, I've the prettiest little parlor that ever you did spy."

That is Shakspeare. [Laughter.]

Mr. RADFORD. Does the law require them to meet there? [Laughter.]

Mr. SHELLABARGER. The majority of the committee tell us that we are bound to take the account which has been made up by these men thus guilty of conduct denominated revolutionary by Judge Black, and that we are not only bound to take it as good evidence, but that it has efficacy such as to shut the eyes of Congress to every other return and fact in the case, and this although the wrongs of these judges are shown by the very papers which they produce to make out their case. Sir, I deny both the positions. I say that the return judge from Somerset county did right in refusing to go into a board where he had knowledge that the returns had been so altered, in violation of law, as that the will of the district would surely be defeated.

Now, what is the consequence that comes from this position that it was right for Somerset to stay out of the board? Why, not that it enables the four other counties to elect a Representative, but it merely compels them to do as Mr. Meredith says they ought to have done, to wit, send and get the Somerset vote, or if that be impracticable, it sends all the votes here to Congress to be counted by this House.

The position that the gentlemen take is this: let four men exclude the legal votes of the soldiers, and let them count up the rest in violation of the express requirement of the law, which says that they shall count all the votes, and in violation of that other provision of the law which says no informality shall be regarded, and in violation of that still further provision of the law which says that—

(10th.) "It shall not be lawful for said judges or clerks, in casting up the votes which shall appear to have been given, as shown by the certificates, to omit or reject any part thereof, except where, in the opinion of said judges, such certificate is so defective as to prevent the same from being understood and computed in adding together the number of votes; in which case a certified copy of such paper shall be attached to the return, and the original deposited in the prothonotary's office."

Each one of these vital legal requirements was violated in the rejection of soldiers' votes in Adams and Bedford counties, and also in the making up of this district return which rejected or omitted Somerset county. And yet gentlemen say that these are good returns, binding in law, and such that Congress cannot only not go back of them but such as shut the eyes of Congress to all the other legal and certified returns in the case, including those of the soldiers' votes which had been rejected by boards having no jurisdiction to reject them; and that they are binding although these flagrant wrongs appear on the very papers which make out Mr. Coffroth's case.

Sir, I will be party to no such a proceeding. I say that it is the duty of Congress to do what those men ought to have done, namely, count the votes. And I was not surprised that my very skillful colleague on the committee, [Mr. URSON,] who is managing this case, felt unwilling to answer the question put to him by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] He managed to avoid one of the plainest and simplest questions in the world, to wit, who had the most votes as shown by the papers. Now, I will answer the question that my colleague would not answer. As shown by the legal returns in this case the largest number of votes were obtained by Mr. Koontz. And it is only by rejecting the votes of the soldiers that you can possibly give this seat to Mr. Coffroth.

Mr. UPSON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that I did not answer that question?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I heard no answer.

Mr. UPSON. I ask the gentleman if the question was not repeated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] on my right here, and if I did not answer that by counting all the legal returns Mr. Koontz was not now entitled to the seat, and Mr. Coffroth was?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. That answer was not given at the time I was listening to the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. I understood my colleague on the committee [Mr. URSON] to put in the words "legal returns."

Mr. UPSON. I go further, and say that if the gentleman will take all the returns now he cannot, by any sort of arithmetic, give a majority to Mr. Koontz.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. URSON] must mean the returns made by the board; he cannot mean anything else. If he will take the returns made by the primary officers he will find that they give a majority of 68 votes for Mr. Koontz. He therefore must be mistaken in that matter.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. In order that there may be no mistake about this matter, I will now state precisely what votes were cast, what votes are proved to be legal votes by the returns made to the committee, and what precincts and counties they are from, and what papers in this case prove each vote.

Here the entire vote received by the minority of the committee is:

Recapitulation.	Coffroth.	Koontz.
Franklin county, entire vote.....	3,457	3,508
Fulton county, entire vote.....	807	535
Somerset county, entire vote.....	1,592	2,512
Making.....	5,856	6,555
Bedford county, home vote, as per No. 8, page 30.....	2,410	1,740
Bedford county, part of soldiers' vote, as per No. 9, page 31.....	94	318
Adams county, including home and part of soldiers' vote, No. 11, page 2, 2,707	2,707	2,366
Making entire undisputed vote.....	11,067	10,979
Votes rejected by majority judges, but received by the minority of the Committee of Elections:
Adams county, company K of 184, as per No. 30, page 65 (1 off).....	21	38
Adams county, companies B and G of 138, as per No. 26, page 54.....	1	32
Adams county, company I of 210, as per No. 27, page 57.....	9	19
Adams county, company B, 21 cavalry, as per No. 28, page 61 (2 off K).....	4	34
Bedford county, company H of 208, as per No. 19, page 1, and No. 18.....	18	18
Bedford county, Barracks No. 1, as per No. 20, page 43, and No. 31, page 68 (2 off of K).....	29	56
Adams county, Mower, Cuyler, and McClellan hospitals, pages 50 to 53,...	11,149	11,176
Koontz's majority.....	11,149	11,181
		32

And a part of the soldiers' vote for Bedford county which was counted by the majority of the committee, shows 94 votes for Coffroth and 318 for Koontz. In Adams county, including the home vote and the part of the soldiers' vote not included, there were 2,707 votes for Coffroth, and 2,366 votes for Koontz. This is the undisputed vote, and it aggregates 11,067 for Coffroth, and 10,979 for Koontz. That is undisputed, thus far, by both the majority and the minority of the committee; they all agree that that is right.

Now, I have shown the votes which I say elected Mr. Koontz. I have named every paper from every precinct that produces that result, and I ask my colleagues in this case—not now, but when they come to reply—to answer the exhibit of figures I have now made of the votes rejected by the majority. In Adams county, of company K, one hundred and eighty-fourth regiment of Pennsylvania volunteers, there were 21 votes for Coffroth and 38 for Koontz. Why were those votes rejected? Because one man from Franklin county had voted along with these men from Adams county; and that was reason enough for rejecting the whole vote; and that is the way that Mr. Coffroth is to get his seat, if he does get it. One man from Franklin county voted with the soldiers from Adams county. The returns had been rightly made, even to the highest degree of technical correctness; and yet those judges rejected the whole concern and deprive Mr. Koontz of the benefit of the difference between 21 votes for his antagonist and 38 votes for himself. And that is the way the whole thing is manipulated all through. Then companies B and G gave 1 vote for Coffroth and 32 for Koontz.

And why, pray, was that rejected? Because soldiers from different companies voted at one election, a thing that, as has been shown by my friend on the committee, it was perfectly competent to do under the law. There is no law to prevent soldiers from a thousand companies from voting at one election, provided there is only one organized company at the place. There is nothing here on the face of the papers to show that there were two organized companies there. Yet, sir, running up to the most extreme and exquisite style of technicalities in order to do injustice to the American soldiers, these men at home had declared that they would throw out that soldiers' vote in order to elect the man against whom that vote was cast. There was nothing under heaven, I assert, to authorize the throwing out of that vote. That vote was rejected. I count it, sir.

Here, again, is company I, of the two hundred and tenth regiment, proved by paper 27, on page 57 of the report, giving 9 votes for Mr. Coffroth, and 19 for his antagonist, Mr. Koontz. Thus Mr. Koontz is deprived of 10 votes. Then, again, here is the vote of company B, twenty-first cavalry, proved by paper 28, on page 61 of the report. Throwing out, as the minority do, 2 of the votes for Mr. Koontz, you have 4 for Mr. Coffroth, and 34 for Mr. Koontz. All these votes are thrown out for reasons which are indicated in the report, and which are well understood by gentlemen who gave attention to the able remarks of my colleague, [Mr. PAINE.]

Now, sir, these votes which I have enumerated elect Mr. Koontz by precisely 32 majority. And if you reject all the votes from Bedford county which were rejected by the judges, Koontz is still elected by 5 majority.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let this House simply do what the returns in the case enable and bind Congress to do, to wit, simply count the legal votes presented, and Mr. Koontz is elected. Unless gentlemen can deny the papers in the case, they cannot deny that these votes elect Mr. Koontz by 32 majority.

Keep now in mind the three rules of the law that I have already named:

"First, no mere informality in the manner of carrying out or executing any of the provisions of this act shall invalidate any election held under the same or authorize the return thereof to be rejected or set aside.

"Second, the district board so constituted shall cast up the several county returns, and make duplicate returns of all the votes given for such office in the district, and the name of the person or persons elected. And

"Third, that provision prohibiting any return from being rejected that is intelligible, and even when not intelligible, requiring it to be returned to the body which tries a contest."

Also remember that we have before us in this House the identical papers, in reference to which those judges had no other duty than merely to add up the votes they showed. Remembering these, the members of this House are to decide whether they are going to permit a false adding up by these men, who in law are incapable of any other act than to add and return figures, to deprive the American people of their voice and their Representative of his seat and give it to another, when it is shown by the legal returns before the House that this false estimate has been attained by illegally, and without any jurisdiction over the matter, rejecting the votes of the soldiers.

The returns must be counted if capable of being deciphered, and if not, must still be returned. Here, then, we have it provided by the laws of Pennsylvania that even those returns which are so defective that they cannot be counted by the return judges must be sent to Congress to be counted. Why send them here or to the other courts trying contests, if these county judges may pass upon and reject them forever? Now the majority of the committee have reported that Congress is impotent to count; that those men who disregarded the law and threw out soldiers' votes have concluded Congress; that, although we have returns here which may be technically accurate, and although they show Mr. Koontz was elected, yet by this false return of the district board, or false returns of these county boards, Congress shall be concluded on the prima facie case, so that we shall not give the seat to the man who was elected by the votes which were duly and regularly returned to be counted under the law.

That is all there is of this case, and here I leave it. I have merely sought to discharge my duties as a member of the committee. I leave it where I began by saying that the whole case turns upon the question whether this House is to be permitted to count votes which are legally returned to it; whether it is to be precluded from attaining the truth as shown by all the legal returns, and are to give conclusive validity to a paper shown to be illegal by its own face.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. UPSON. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan, who reported the resolution from the Committee of Elections, is under the rules entitled to one hour to close the debate.

Mr. UPSON. I yield ten minutes of my time to my friend from New York, [Mr. Hotchkiss.]

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Mr. Speaker, before casting my vote on this question I desire to explain my views as the case strikes me. I have examined the reports of the majority and minority of the Committee of Elections in this case, and in my opinion, allowing full force and effect to every paper presented on the side of Mr. Koontz, embracing every soldier's vote, certified to by papers, regular, irregular, and defective, the report of the minority fails to show the election of Mr. Koontz. I desire to meet the question upon that ground, and if I am mistaken about it it will be an easy matter to correct me, for I do not wish the soldiers' vote to be cast aside in this or in any other case if there is any paper which has any validity showing such a vote has been cast.

And now, if the House will hear me for a few moments, I will call their attention to page 18 of the report, where the minority of the committee give a table or statement of the vote certified to. This table states the number of votes cast at Barracks No. 1 for Bedford county to be 29 for Coffroth and 56 for Koontz, making 85. The votes cast at those barracks gave Mr. Koontz the entire excess of 37 votes, whereas in truth those papers show only 46 votes were cast at those barracks for Bedford county.

I am asked about Fulton county. I understand about that, and will show how the minority propose to transfer this excess over to Fulton county. They say the whole subject was examined and the excess should be returned for Fulton instead of Bedford, but that has no foundation in the papers. There is not a shadow of proof before the House to show that the fact exists. I will show what I mean, and I will make my statement so clear that it cannot be answered. The committee will observe, on page 18, that the votes in one table or one statement give Mr. Koontz 32 majority, and in the other 14 majority.

The minority, on page 18, speaking of this statement of votes, say:

"In our judgment, then, the certificate and other papers which were returned to the committee, and were competent as evidence, show the following to have been the whole number of votes legally returned for the respective claimants."

As I have said, this table gives 29 votes for Coffroth and 56 for Koontz. If that statement is incorrect, then the minority report falls to the ground. But I now refer to page 48, in which they certify in their statements only 46 votes were cast for Bedford county.

They state in the tally-list that of these 46 Mr. Koontz had 58 and Mr. Coffroth 29! That tally-list does not override the statement. It goes on to state the votes cast for the other officers voted for, and it says that only 46 votes all told were cast for any officer at Barracks No. 1. But on page 16 the minority undertake to explain this, or rather they get up a theory to account for the 37 or 39 votes in excess stated in the tally-list. They say, in substance, that it should be carried to the credit of Fulton county. They say:

"The return of Barracks No. 1 was rejected for the alleged reason that the poll-book contains the names of only 48 electors, and yet 87 votes were cast for Representative in Congress. Passing from that return, which exhibits no such discrepancy—" how can the minority say that it exhibits no such discrepancy when it gives the name of every voter and there are but 46 all told? It gives the number of votes that were cast on the Union side for the State officers and the number cast on the Democratic side for the same, making just 46. And then there is this statement showing that 85 votes were cast for Representative in Congress after giving the name of every voter, leaving 39 votes unaccounted for.

Sir, that paper on its face is a very great blunder or a very stupid fraud, and I do not think we can dispose of this question upon the basis of either a blunder or a fraud and give either party the benefit of it. Reject the blunder and Mr. Coffroth is elected, according to the report of the minority. Give Mr. Koontz the benefit of that blunder and it is a mere statement without any basis.

Now, the theory of the minority directly contradicts the returns from Fulton county, signed by all the judges and clerks of that county, where they say these votes should have been sent. But suppose you go behind the returns of the judges of Fulton county, which are unanimous and uncontradicted, and go to the soldiers' camp to search for these 37 or 39 votes. Then you have to turn to page 68, where the judges of election at the soldiers' barracks make their returns. They say that for Fulton county 37 votes were cast, all told. Now, those 37 votes the minority of the committee say were these 37 that were attempted to be incorporated in the returns for Bedford county; they say that they were all cast, and they give Mr. Koontz the benefit of all of them.

Now, how were those 37 votes divided politically? Why this same return which they refer to shows that 17 of them were Democratic votes and 10 were Union votes.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I will.

Mr. PAINE. The gentleman has entirely misunderstood that point of the report. It is true that the return which is made for this county does embrace more men than are shown to have voted from that county for Representative in Congress. But when you look to the other counties of which the gentleman has been speaking, you find that enough men there voted to make out the entire congressional vote. It is not true, however, that in allowing these votes to be counted in this case you have all of them counted for Mr. Koontz. On the other hand, the distribution as between Mr. Koontz and Mr. Coffroth is made in that aggregate return which is before us. And if you look at the return which the gentleman is now speaking of you will find that there is a blank for the word "Representative." Return is made for Representative, blank, showing that on the part of the officers of the election there was a failure to send to the proper place the return for Representative. It is not true that there is no reference made at all to a Representative vote in that return.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I am surprised that a gentleman who has labored so long in this committee as that gentleman has, and of his ability, too, should so mistake his own report. The page to which I refer shows that every one of these 37 votes is allowed to Mr. Koontz to make out his majority of 32 in one case, and of 14 in the other. I refer to page 18 of the report, and if I am incorrect I will sit down and never speak again in this House.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman—

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Will the gentleman hear me through? Now I state further, that in going back to the barracks to count the votes for Fulton county the gentleman includes all the votes cast for Fulton county, namely, 37, whereas five officers certify that 17 of these votes were Democratic votes. Now, how do they get along with that? They take all the Democratic votes cast there, and undertake to say that they were a part of this discrepancy of 37. Now, take the paper itself and give it all its force, and no lawyer can spell out of it sufficient to make a case.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman answer me this question? In making the count does he allow the whole 58 votes?

Mr. HOTCHKISS. On page 18 of the report Mr. Koontz is allowed 56 votes.

Mr. STEVENS. Fifty-eight votes.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Some say 56 votes, and some say 58 votes. They allowed Mr. Coffroth 29 votes, which is the number of Democratic votes cast at Barracks No. 1 in this city. They allow Mr. Koontz the 56 votes, which include these 37 votes.

Mr. STEVENS. What I meant to ask is this: does the gentleman add up those 56 votes with the others?

Mr. HOTCHKISS. The minority of the committee—

Mr. STEVENS. I am asking about what the gentleman does in the statement he says he has so carefully made.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I have not said that I had carefully made any statement. I said that I had carefully examined the statement made by the minority of the committee; and that statement had no foundation in the facts upon which the minority say they rely.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. UPSON. I will now yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS. In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, this discussion has taken a range not fully justified by the question before us. We sent to the Committee of Elections the question of the prima facie right to this seat, because the authorities at Harrisburg had said that no one had that prima facie right. It was the single question of who had the greatest number of votes according to all the papers before them. If there is any objection in regard to any of the votes contained in those papers, that is a question to be considered and decided in the consideration of the claim of the contestant afterwards. All we sent to the committee was the question of the prima facie right to this seat upon the papers before them. Yet here we have had an investigation into frauds and false returns and erroneous returns.

Now, a single word as to the law of Pennsylvania will show that all this is aside from the question and ought never to have been considered in this connection. By the law of Pennsylvania elections are held at the different polls by two inspectors and one judge of election. At night, when the poll is closed, these two inspectors and one judge add up the votes and make out tally-lists and return them. In order to aggregate all the votes, they are all to meet on a certain Friday following at the county seat; and by the express provisions of the law that county board can do nothing but add up the votes returned to them. They are not permitted to inquire into the regularity of the returns; they are not permitted to inquire into the fraudulent conduct or character of the officers or votes. The law is express upon that point, and it has been so decided over and over again, and no Pennsylvania lawyer dares dispute that. When the county board meets it takes the precinct returns as they are, good, bad, and indifferent, and adds them all up, and upon that the county officers give their certificate. And that is tested in the proper body upon the question of the fraudulency or illegality of the votes upon a contest, and nowhere else. For State elections it is sent to Harrisburg to the secretary of the Commonwealth and contested in the Legislature and nowhere else on earth. Any man who undertakes to contest it anywhere else does not know his duty under the laws of Pennsylvania.

Now, what have we here? We have the votes taken in the different precincts of this district, and we have them taken at Barracks No. 1, in the District of Columbia. Under the soldiers' voting law the votes of the soldiers are to be returned to the prothonotaries of the district in which the soldiers reside, duplicate returns being sent to the secretary of the Commonwealth. And no man, in meeting in county board, dare inquire into the regularity of a single vote that was cast. His duties are in the law, and have been decided over and over again. The law is as plain as the nose on a man's face, that all the board has to do is to add up these returns as they receive them, and make return of them to the House of Representatives, or to Harrisburg, and whoever desires to contest the prima facie case of the right by a majority of the votes to a seat in this House must come here and do it, and nowhere else.

Now, we have a discussion here as to the irregularity of these votes, and what was struck out by the county boards. It is admitted, or if not the facts show it to be true, that if all the votes returned from this district and from the different precincts in the counties in the congressional district had been counted and returned, Mr. Koontz would have had 68 majority. There is no doubt about that; here are the figures as plain as day, and whoever says to the contrary, has not examined, and does not know the facts in the case.

It is said that in Bedford county there was a mistake of 37 votes. Now, the gentleman who has just sat down [Mr. Hotchkiss] has been misled by his examination of this matter. It appears that elections for the counties of Bedford and Fulton were held in this city at Barracks No. 1, and as the return was made out, the number of votes for Mr. Koontz was 58, and for Mr. Coffroth was 29. They were all credited to Bedford county. If that is taken as true, then no man can deny that Mr. Koontz is entitled to his seat prima facie, whatever may be the case when we come to consider the question of fraudulent votes.

But the gentleman who reported these resolutions says that those 58 votes and 29 votes are 37 more than the tally-papers show to have been cast for Bedford county. That is true; but if he had taken the tally-papers for Fulton county, they would have made precisely that sum—

Mr. UPSON. I desire to ask the gentleman where he finds any return from Fulton county certifying that they voted for a Representative in Congress.

Mr. STEVENS. They do not return from Fulton county the 37 votes as having been cast for anybody, because they had returned them all before in the Bedford county return.

Mr. UPSON. They certified from Bedford county that only 46 voted. Now, I desire to know how the gentleman finds that the others voted.

Mr. STEVENS. I have just referred to the document. But I will read it from page 41 of the report:

"Poll-book of the election held on Tuesday, the 11th day of October, in the year 1861, by the qualified electors of Bedford county, in the State of Pennsylvania, in the actual military service under the requisition of the President of the United States, and being unable to attend any company poll or other proper place of election; this election being held at Barrack No. 1, Soldiers' Rest, Washington city, District of Columbia, which placed the said electors, being present, have selected for opening a poll for the said election and certify herein:

"David Bollman, William Brallier, and John H. Akers, being then and there duly elected judges of the said election, and Barton A. Cooper and Josiah H. Anderson being duly appointed clerks of said election, and being all severally affirmed according to the certificates herewith returned."

Then below are given the "number and names of the electors voting at the said election, and their county, city, borough, township, ward, or precinct of residence." After that list, we find—

"Tally-papers or list of votes for each person voted for at the said election by the qualified voters of Bedford county, State of Pennsylvania, for Representative in the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, sixteenth district.

"For Congress, William H. Koontz had 58 votes; A. H. Coffroth had 29 votes."

Now, I say that, taking this as true, you cannot make out that Mr. Coffroth was elected; it is impossible.

But the gentleman says that the tally-papers show that there were not that many votes by 37—

Mr. UPSON. The gentleman reads from the tally-papers.

Mr. STEVENS. I read from the return.

Mr. UPSON. There is no return there.

Mr. STEVENS. What do you call this?

"For Congress, William H. Koontz had 58 votes; A. H. Coffroth had 29 votes."

Mr. UPSON. Will the gentleman read the caption of that paper?

Mr. STEVENS. I have already read it; but I will read it again. It is in these words:

"Tally-papers or list of votes for each person voted for at the said election by the qualified voters of Bedford county, State of Pennsylvania, for Representative in the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, sixteenth district.

"For Congress, William H. Koontz had 58 votes; A. H. Coffroth had 29 votes."

Now, taking that to be true, does it not elect Mr. Koontz?

The gentleman says, however, that the tally-papers do not agree with that return. But that is all explained when we find that those 37 votes from Fulton county are not included in the return from that county, but are included in the Bedford county return.

I maintain, sir, that on the face of the papers you cannot count out Mr. Koontz; and if you go into the merits of the question, everybody, I believe, admits that the merits are with him. This question may seem to some gentlemen to be a small matter; but in view of thick-coming events, one vote may prove to be of great value here.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I know the impatience of the House to come to a vote on this question, and I am not far from members in that impatience; but I desire to say, on reading these several reports and listening attentively to the arguments pro and con, my mind is brought to the conclusion that the majority of the committee are right under the resolution of this House in giving the prima facie case to Mr. Coffroth. And when I say that, I hope I will not be considered as actuated by any partisan interest or feeling. I regard the resolution under which this committee has acted as being of some import; and what was it, sir? They were instructed to inquire into the prima facie right to a seat in this House, and then afterward to provide for a contest upon the merits. Now, I appeal to any well-informed man in this House if my friends of the minority have not uniformly put the claims of Mr. Koontz on the merits of the case and not upon the prima facie evidence as the committee have done.

One word in regard to the papers presented to this committee, and I shall be very brief. It seems that the proclamation of the Governor of Pennsylvania was wanting in regard to this sixteenth district, and why? Because the certificate of the election judges for the district in which this election was held was defective in this, that the county of Somerset was not returned and represented. Why was not the county of Somerset returned and represented, because in the absence of the proclamation of the Governor we must get the next best evidence in regard to this prima facie right? The next best evidence would be the certificate of this district board. We have here produced the opinion of the attorney general of the State of Pennsylvania, saying that the four district judges who certified in favor of Mr. Coffroth were all qualified to act, and that the five men who certified in favor of his opponent, Mr. Koontz, were not legally constituted judges for that purpose.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a single word.

Mr. SPALDING. I must decline to yield to the gentleman, as I have only ten minutes and I wish to use them. My friend from Ohio labored in this case, if I may borrow a trite expression, like a strong man wading through a morass. He knows he is deficient in his argument. He knows the evidence does not sustain him. He went into the merits and not the prima facie case. I want to show what is the prima facie case. The certificate of the four legally constituted judges with the consent of the judge from Somerset would have put an end to the whole question. If that certificate had been signed in Chambersburg by that judge on that occasion this difficulty would not have sprung up, Mr. Coffroth would have had his certificate and been the sitting member. No one controverts this.

Now, sir, the legitimate evidence was before the committee to show why the judge from Somerset did not go before the board and present the vote of that county: What was it? Because that vote was deficient 93 to give to Mr. Koontz the majority. He therefore availed himself of the privilege of retiring, although he was notified the board was ready to act and was in the town of Chambersburg. He stepped aside and withheld the vote of Somerset and let four of the five make a certificate which did not answer the requisitions of the law. The committee had evidence before them what that vote of Somerset was; if it had been presented by this judge on that occasion, it would have made the certificate complete. It was enough to give Mr. Coffroth a majority of 93 votes, and that man knew it. I claim this shall not be taken to benefit Mr. Koontz. I insist that the certificate shall be, whenever you go by evidence before the committee, as it would have been if that man had gone on and returned the votes of his county. I say, no fair-minded man will come to any other conclusion. That will settle the case prima facie in favor of the man who is reported by the committee entitled to it.

One word further. I know the weight of partisan feeling. I know full well how the majority of this House are pressed on this question in favor of the claimant, Mr. Koontz; but I say to that majority I have seen this man Coffroth more sorely pressed than any of us can be on this occasion in the last Congress when he had the independence to vote with us, which exposed him to the maledictions of his own party. I say I do no more than justice on this occasion. We should treat him with a spirit of fairness, irrespective of party feelings. I am done.

Mr. STEVENS. Who was in the bargain that led him to give that vote?

Mr. SPALDING. I am party to no bargain here either with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] or anybody else.

Mr. UPSON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] a few minutes.

Mr. DAWES. I do not desire to weary the patience of the House at this time, nor do I intend in any degree to go over the ground that has been so ably gone over by the gentlemen who made the majority and minority reports in this case.

But, sir, I believe I understand very well where the trouble is. It is at the starting point. Both of the gentlemen have ably argued the case from the point of view at which they stand, and it is but for the House to determine what it was that they imposed upon this committee to do, and the whole thing is settled. Did they impose upon the committee the duty of inquiring into the merits of this case and ascertain who has received the greatest number of votes, or did they impose upon it the duty of ascertaining what the Governor of Pennsylvania was unable to do, who had the prima facie case? Let me read the resolution instructing the committee. Upon that hangs the whole case:

"Resolved, That the certificates and all other papers relating to the election in the sixteenth congressional district of Pennsylvania be referred to the Committee of Elections, when appointed, with instructions to report at as early a day as practicable which of the rival claimants to the vacant seat from that district has the prima facie right thereto, reserving to the other party the privilege of contesting the case upon the merits without prejudice from lapse of time or want of notice."

With that resolution of instruction before us, it seems to me we had something else to do than to investigate this case on the merits. And I have only to call the attention of the House to-day to the able argument of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] in support of the minority report, to answer the question, whether that minority have adhered to this rule or whether they have not, and whether the learned gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] has not put it entirely upon the ground that it was our duty to ascertain who had the greatest number of votes, and if so, we were required to do that without any testimony, without any examination into the case, but were to decide who had the greatest number of votes without stopping to inquire into the truth in reference to a single vote. I did not so understand my duty under this resolution. If I mistook it, then the majority on the committee have departed from what the House required of them. If I am right in this, that we were to leave the merits of the case until they could be examined in the light of the testimony taken on one side and the other, then the majority of the committee are right.

What is the prima facie case? What is the prima facie title to a seat which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and every other gentleman brings to this House? It is the proclamation of the Governor. Neither of these parties had this proclamation. Is it not then our duty to betake ourselves to the position in which the Governor himself was and see if we can find the testimony properly and legally brought before him and in existence upon which to base a prima facie case? What does he base his prima facie case upon? He bases it in this instance upon the certificate of the return judges of five counties. And I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that until you go to the merits you cannot go behind that certificate.

Now, what was the difficulty with the return upon which the Governor was to base his certificate? Why, they did not embrace but four counties. It was a legal board of four out of five judges, but it did not embrace but four counties. Why not? Because one of those five judges chose not to go into that board—chose to absent himself from it because he thought some of these other four had made a mistake in their calculation which he had nothing to do with in their own counties. And here I will say in passing that it was the most natural thing in the world that he should have gone to Attorney General Black to support him in this idea of seceding from the board and breaking it up by that operation. And that is all I have to say about that opinion.

Well, sir, there was a competent board with four full returns of the four counties before them. They could not return five because they had not got the fifth. The man who was intrusted with it had gone out with the return in his pocket.

Now, what did the majority of the committee do? They just supplied that deficiency. They put in that return from the fifth county about which there is no dispute. Then they took what they had and put it with what the Governor and his attorney general said was all that was necessary. For the attorney general, in his printed opinion, says if they had not added Somerset county, that it would have been his duty to have given the prima facie title to Mr. Coffroth. So, as there was no dispute about it, we put it along with the four and we then had just what the Governor and his attorney general said they must do to give the prima facie case to Mr. Coffroth. Go behind those certificates and you get into a position that is presented here, of contesting and wrangling upon what this paper means, which can be settled only by testimony on one side and on the other. It is because I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that we have no business to go behind these certificates on the prima facie case, that I say we did just what the Governor and the attorney general say is all that was necessary, put Somerset with the other four counties, and there it is.

Now, you go behind those certificates; you find something the matter with this return, and something the matter with that return, and there is diversity of opinion, but all of it susceptible of explanation by testimony, none of which was sent to the committee. Let me refer to an instance. This return of 78 votes for member of Congress, cast by 39 persons, is explained by the minority of the committee by the theory that the balance of these persons belonged in another county, and therefore ought to be counted. Now, to show you how unsafe it is to take that theory, let me state a single fact. That explanation was never thought of before the committee. On the other hand, a very different theory was urged by Mr. Koontz and his counsel to explain that discrepancy. They suggested that it had got to be almost night; that the Congress vote was the only one cared for; and in their anxiety to get in the Congress vote they allowed the balance of them to vote without recording their names. That was the statement made by them before the committee; and it was only after my learned colleagues on the committee began to make up their minority report that they adopt this other theory that they must be charged to another county.

Now, that may be right. I do not mean to say that it is not right. But I mean to say that it is the most unsafe thing in the world to take these theories in reference to these papers, when we are called upon, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] well says, to stand by the certificates until we go into the merits of the case.

My friends, in this prima facie case, have counted returns that never have been sworn to, although the law requires that they should be sworn to. And they have counted those that have been sworn to before an officer contrary to the provisions of the law. Now, in going into the merits of the case that is all right; we should go behind those returns and examine them. But upon a prima facie case we should not do so. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has acted with me over and over again, and unseated men upon the merits of the case because of such returns. I can refer the gentleman to reports that have unseated men on the merits of the case, because the returns were not sworn to. And yet on this prima facie case we are called upon, going behind all these returns, to count all these votes.

All I care for in the decision of this case is the precedent. Having had a great deal of experience on this Committee of Elections, for once I desire to leave a record behind me that shall be consistent with itself, if nothing else, and upon that record I am willing to be judged as a lawyer. I have called upon this House over and over again, and I have had the aid of every member from Pennsylvania then in this House, to sustain me upon the very points upon which this majority report has now been made. And they will be called upon within a week, perhaps, to do the very same thing again. And unless, like my learned friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] they can entirely disembarass themselves to-day of anything they said yesterday, they will come up and vote in the next case, or the next but one, or in some other case, precisely in accordance with the report of the majority of the committee in this case. This is all I desire to state.

The details of this case have been gone over very ably by my friend from Michigan, [Mr. UPSON,] who represents the majority of the committee, and by my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE,] who represents the minority of the committee. I am not going into that maze of labyrinth. I mean to put this case simply upon the fact that we had what the Governor of Pennsylvania and his attorney general say was all that was lacking to enable him to give Mr. Coffroth precisely the same prima facie title to a seat here that is asked by the majority of the committee. When the time shall come to go into the merits of the case, upon the evidence, I doubt not my friends of the minority of the committee will find the majority, as the majority of the committee believe they will find the minority, earnestly desirous of reaching every vote honestly cast by soldier or civilian, here or anywhere else, and of giving it its full effect. Till then, when I am called upon to state what is the prima facie case, excluding by the very terms of the resolution my entering into the merits of the case, I hold myself bound to do that only, and that is the reason why I join with the majority of the committee in this report.

Mr. UPSON. I now yield five minutes of my time to my colleague upon the committee from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. I am astonished, Mr. Speaker, to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] claim that Mr. Coffroth has the papers, even if Mr. Koontz has the votes. I was astonished to hear my friend from New York [Mr. HOTCHKISS] take the same ground.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I desire, with the gentleman's permission, to say one word by way of explanation.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have only five minutes, and I cannot yield.

Sir, I deny that Mr. Coffroth has the papers. When the election day closed in Pennsylvania, and the three officers whose duty it was counted the votes, and made a written memorandum, signing their names to it—when such a count was made and signed, not only of the home vote but of the soldiers' vote—it must be conceded by every candid man that, as shown by the papers referred to the committee, Mr. Koontz had a majority of 68. The man who denies this greatly mistakes, in my judgment, the facts of the case.

Mr. UPSON. I desire to inquire of my friend whether the tabular statement made up by the minority of the committee does not give Mr. Koontz a majority of only 32. That being the fact, by what process does the gentleman now make the majority for Mr. Koontz more than double that number?

Mr. SCOFIELD. Upon one hypothesis his majority is 32; but counting some votes which are omitted from that summing up, his majority is 68.

Now, sir, as there was a majority for Mr. Koontz on the night of the election, when the votes had all been counted, why has he not received a certificate? Because, when the board, whose simple duty it was to add up the votes, and to do nothing else, met in Bedford county and Adams county, the Democrats said, "We will not count the votes, we will not add up the returns that come from the soldiers in the field;" while the Republicans said, "We will add up those votes." So the board divided. There was the point of departure.

Henceforth there never was a proper adding up of all the votes by a full board. The Republicans added all the votes, including the soldiers' vote; the Democrats added all the votes, including a portion of the soldiers' vote. Therefore we nowhere had a legal addition of all the votes. We had the summing up of the votes made by the judges in each election precinct. Those various precinct returns were referred by this House to the Committee of Elections. That committee added them up. No board had ever summed them up. One portion of the board had added together a portion of the votes; another portion of the board had added together the whole of the votes. But the minority of the Committee of Elections added them all together, making a majority of 68 for Mr. Koontz. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. UPSON. I now yield to my colleague, [Mr. DAWES,] who wishes one minute.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] has expressed his surprise that gentlemen taking the opposite view from that adopted by him should say, "Though Mr. Koontz has the votes, Mr. Coffroth has the papers." I was equally surprised when my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] put his advocacy of the claims of Mr. Koontz upon the ground that we may, in view of events which are coming on, realize the value of one vote. Sir, I want to vote right on this question; and I will vote in the manner which I believe to be right, regardless of consequences. I believe that the votes, honestly counted, are in favor of Mr. Coffroth; and for that reason I shall vote to give him the seat.

Mr. UPSON. I now yield for a few moments to my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. HUBBARD.]

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I wish to give the views which will control my vote on this occasion, and peradventure may control the votes of others. I agree that we should not have any partisan feeling. This is a mere question of prima facie right to a seat upon this floor between two contestants. The majority of the committee have justly reported in favor of Mr. Coffroth as having that prima facie right. As I understand the minority I cannot vote with them, because they have passed over the question which was submitted to them and upon which the majority have made their report; that is, who has a prima facie right to a seat upon this floor. I have confidence in the Committee of Elections, but I have more confidence in the report of the majority than in the report of the minority, for I believe that in the multitude of counselors there is safety. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Speaker, all who are upon this floor know very well we cannot take up an election case here, consider it carefully, and come to a correct conclusion on the subject. We are all appointed by you, members of committees. We have submitted this to the Committee of Elections. They have considered it carefully. They have had all the evidence before them. They come in and make a report; and they make that report upon their oaths. I have confidence in that report, and shall vote in accordance with it. [Applause.]

Mr. UPSON. I do not think the House needs any further discussion of this subject; and I therefore yield the floor, that the vote may be taken.

The SPEAKER stated the first question in order to be on the following resolutions, offered as an amendment by the minority of the committee:

1. Resolved, That William H. Koontz has the prima facie right to a seat in this House, as a Representative of the sixteenth congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania.

2. Resolved, That Alexander H. Coffroth, desiring to contest the right of William H. Koontz to a seat as a Representative of the sixteenth congressional district, be required to serve upon the said Koontz, within fifteen days after the adoption of this resolution, a particular statement of the grounds of said contest; and that the said Koontz be required to serve upon the said Coffroth his answer thereto within fifteen days thereafter; and that both parties be allowed sixty days next after the service of said answer to take testimony in support of their several allegations and denials; notices of proposed examinations of witnesses to be given at least five days before such examinations; no such examination to be commenced at one place before the expiration of five days from the conclusion of the last examination at another place; such examinations to be regulated in all other respects by the provisions of the act of February 19, 1851.

Mr. SLOAN. Is it in order to move to refer the whole subject back to the committee with instructions?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order, as the main question has been ordered.

Mr. SLOAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. UPSON. I move to lay that question on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAINE demanded the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 58, nays 82, not voting 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Baker,

So the resolutions were rejected.

During the vote,

Mr. GLOSSBRENNER stated that his colleague, Mr. DAWSON, was paired with Mr. DONNELLY, of Minnesota.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question then recurred on the following:

Resolved, That Alexander H. Coffroth, upon the certificates and papers relating to the election in the sixteenth congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania, has the prima facie right to the vacant seat from that district, and is entitled to take the oath of office and occupy a seat in this House as the Representative in Congress from said district, without prejudice to the right of William H. Koontz, claiming to have been duly elected thereto, to contest his right to said seat upon the merits.

Resolved, That William H. Koontz, desiring to contest the right of Hon. Alexander H. Coffroth to a seat in this House as a Representative from the sixteenth district of the State of Pennsylvania, be, and he is, required to serve upon the said Coffroth, within fifteen days after the passage of this resolution, a particular statement of the grounds of said contest, and that the said Coffroth be, and he is hereby, required to serve upon the said Koontz his answer thereto within fifteen days thereafter, and that both parties be allowed sixty days next after the service of said answer to take testimony in support of their several allegations and denials, notice of intention to examine witnesses to be given to the opposite party at least five days before their examination, but neither party to give notice of taking testimony within less than five days between the close of taking it at one place and its commencement at another, but in all other respects in the manner prescribed in the act of February 19, 1851.

Mr. WENTWORTH. If the first resolution fails, does not this resolution go back to the people and let them fight it out there?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer that question.

The resolutions were adopted.

Mr. UPSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COFFROTH presented himself at the Speaker's desk and was duly qualified.

BANKRUPT BILL.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was House bill No. 7, to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, upon which Mr. JENCKES had the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the special order now pending be postponed until the next special order is disposed of, which is the loan bill. I do this with the assent of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES.]

Mr. JENCKES. The bankrupt bill will then come up next, after the loan bill is disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THAYER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 20, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 268) for the relief of Albert Nevins; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 75) to encourage and facilitate telegraphic communication between the western and eastern continents.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRIMES presented resolutions of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of the establishment of the following mail routes in that State: from the city of McGregor, Clayton county, to Strawberry Point, in that county; from the city of Des Moines, via Indianola, Chariton, and Corydon, to Lineville, on the State line between Iowa and Missouri; from Independence, Buchanan county, to Fayette, in the county of Fayette; from Ossian, in Winneshick county, to Charles City, in Floyd county; and from Des Moines to Grove City, in Cass county; which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, presented a petition of assistant assessors of internal revenue in the second district of Indiana, praying for an increase of their compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of citizens of Tarrytown, Westchester county, New York, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Tarrytown to White Plains, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented resolutions of the Union League Club of the city of New York, in favor of certain guarantees in the restoration of the rebellious territory to practical relations in the Union, namely, the exclusion from office of all who have borne arms as officers in the military or naval service or held office under or willingly contributed money to the so-called confederate government; repudiation of all debts contracted in the prosecution of the rebellion; equality before the law to all men without regard to race or color; the prohibition of all class legislation, and the extension of the elective franchise to all classes; which were referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. WILLEY presented the petition of Sarah Rodman, widow of Robert C. Rodman, late a sailmaker in the Navy of the United States, praying for a renewal of her pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOWE presented the memorial of Alfred Guthrie, supervising inspector of steamboats at Chicago, Illinois, praying for a modification of the steamboat law and for an increase of the salaries of steamboat inspectors corresponding with the increased duties imposed on them by the act of June 8, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CRESWELL presented the petition of John McCollum, S. D. McConkey, and others, assistant assessors of the third district of Maryland, praying for an increase of their pay and allowances; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KIRKWOOD presented the petition of T. S. Briscoe, praying for compensation for his services in recruiting men for the Army in Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HENDERSON. I present the petition of twelve hundred citizens of the State of Missouri, praying Congress to consider, in the restoration of civil government in the southern States, the principles involved in the following resolutions:

1. To the President of the United States belongs, according to the Constitution, only the executive power; he has no right to make laws; we therefore denounce as a usurpation his arbitrary proceedings in restoring the political status of the States lately in rebellion without consulting the Congress.

2. We just as sternly protest against his recognition of the constitutions of those States, framed by dubious representatives, elected by equally dubious electors.

3. The so-called sovereignty of the States was the main cause of the rebellion; it is therefore eminently necessary to get rid of this evil, and to take such measures as will make us in the future a nation of Americans, a purpose clearly aimed at by the founders of the Union. Class legislation and compulsory labor are two more cancers poisoning the very vitals of the Republic; it is therefore necessary radically to cure them. Treason, miserable treason, has menaced the life of our country; it is therefore necessary to treat it so as to secure us against its recurrence in time to come. The rebellion has burdened us with an almost unbearable debt, payment of which is closely connected with the honor and the welfare of the nation; it is therefore necessary that we guard against its repudiation. The policy, however, pursued by the President overlooks all these points, and restores the former pernicious and perilous state of things, thereby endangering all the results of the nation's bloody sacrifice.

4. We therefore pray that the Congress may resist these dangerous proceedings of the Executive, by annulling forthwith, and in an unequivocal manner, those experiments, and by providing ample securities against the alleged evils. Equal rights to all, without distinction of color or descent; let this be one of the safeguards! Verify the principles laid down in the Declaration of Independence, as SCHUYLER COLFAX, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, has advised.

We harbor no feelings of vengeance against the inhabitants of the South, being well aware that they have been a part of our people before, and will be a part of it again; we must recall, however, to the President's memory his own expression, that treason must be made odious, and that mercy to the individual is injustice to the whole community.

We are not crying for the blood of the rebels, but we emphatically protest against the restoration of any of the leaders, civil or military, to citizenship in the United States.

To admit any such man into Congress or to any Federal office would, in our opinion, be a wanton insult to the whole loyal people, a derision of common sense, and treason against the Republic.

5. We call upon our fellow-citizens elsewhere also to express themselves in regard to this important question, so that the true will of the people may be known.

6. These resolutions will be presented and communicated to President Johnson and to our Representatives in Congress.

I ask that the petition be referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

It was so referred.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer a petition, numerously signed by citizens of Wisconsin, in which they ask Congress to see that governments truly republican in form are guaranteed in every State, and they insist that this shall be done by act of Congress. They further ask that irreversible guarantees for the future shall be insisted upon in all reconstruction, and that emancipation is not complete as long as any black code exists, whether what is called civil or political. I offer the petition, and ask its reference to the joint committee of fifteen.

It was so ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer a similar petition from citizens of New Jersey, and another similar petition from citizens of Kansas. I ask for them the same reference.

They were so referred.

Mr. SUMNER. I have another petition, which I have just received from citizens of Massachusetts, asking that Congress should see that no person shall be admitted as a governing partner in the Union until adequate security has been obtained for the future; that the national faith of the United States also shall be guarded carefully, both with regard to our creditors and with regard to our freedmen. I ask the reference of the petition to the joint committee on reconstruction.

It was so referred.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 268) for the relief of Albert Nevins—to the Committee on Pensions.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 75) to encourage and facilitate telegraphic communication between the western and eastern continents—to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GUTHRIE, from the Committee on Finance, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 158) to facilitate the settlement of the accounts of the Treasurer of the United States, and to secure certain moneys to the people of the United States, or to the persons to whom they are due and who are entitled to receive the same; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. POLAND, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers in relation to the case of the ship Niva be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

Mr. McDOUGALL submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the papers relating to the claim of Dakin, Moody, Gilbert & Secor be permitted to be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. CLARK. I think those papers should be examined; it should be known to the Senate what they are before they are sent to the Court of Claims.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It is important that they should be withdrawn to-day. They were referred a year ago to the Naval Committee and have been remaining there, and a question of limitation may arise. The Naval Committee never acted upon them.

Mr. CLARK. It is possible that we might give the Court of Claims jurisdiction where they have it not now, by a resolution of that kind. I would prefer that the papers go to some committee to be examined before they are sent to the Court of Claims. Then, if it is proper, they can be sent to the Court of Claims.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The Senator would not wish to have the statute of limitations bar the claim.

Mr. CLARK. I am not speaking particularly of the statute of limitations, but this resolution may give jurisdiction as to a class of claims of which the court would not have jurisdiction under the law.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Then I make the proposition to withdraw them without reference to the Court of Claims. That will not be objected to, I suppose.

Mr. CLARK. I have no objection to their being withdrawn from the files, if there has been no adverse report.

Mr. McDOUGALL. There has been no adverse report, and I modify the resolution so as to simply withdraw the papers from the files.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC GALLERY.

Mr. CHANDLER. I offer the following resolution, and ask immediate action:

Resolved, That the diplomatic gallery be open to the wives and families of Senators.

Mr. GRIMES. Let that resolution lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it lies over.

CONDITION OF THE SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on reconstruction be directed to inquire into and report how far the States lately in rebellion, or any of them, have complied with the terms proposed by the President as conditions precedent to their resumption of practical relations with the United States, which terms and conditions were as follows, namely:

1. That the several State constitutions should be amended by the insertion of a provision abolishing slavery.
2. That the several State conventions should declare null and void the ordinances of secession and the laws and decrees of the confederacy.
3. That the several State Legislatures should ratify the amendment to the Federal Constitution abolishing slavery.
4. That the rebel debt, State and confederate, should be repudiated.
5. That civil rights should be secured by laws applicable alike to whites and blacks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SUMNER. There can be no objection that I am aware of to the passage of that resolution, as it is addressed to one of our committees, and is in the nature of a resolution of inquiry; but I would remind the Senate that it is now some six weeks, if not two months ago, since the Senate passed a resolution addressed to the President of the United States calling upon him for precisely that information. The President has in his hands, or he ought to have, copies of all the correspondence between himself, telegraphic or otherwise, and the so-called governors of those States. The object of the resolution adopted by the Senate was to call upon the President to supply copies of that correspondence, and also of all the acts, organic or legislative, by any pretended bodies called Legislatures in those States in pursuance of the correspondence of the President. For some reason unknown to me, that call of the Senate has not yet been answered by the President. As the information is in his hands, and not in the hands of a committee of this body, I think it better, perhaps, that the Senate repeat this call once more upon the President, looking to him for the information which better than any other person he can supply.

At the same time, as I have already said, I see no objection to addressing this inquiry to a committee of this body. That committee, if it sees fit, I presume, may put itself in communication with the President, or by original inquiries of its own it may try to ascertain what we desire; but the most direct way is by calling upon the President himself for this information. My colleague says we have done it. I hope, then, that the President may still listen to the call of the Senate and communicate this needed information. It is essential in determining the duties of Congress at this important moment.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

CHINA GRASS.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture investigate the subject of procuring seed and cultivating the "China grass," as set forth in the letter of Mr. William H. Richards, and in the sample accompanying this resolution.

I desire, Mr. President, to direct the attention of the industrial interests of the country to another source of wealth, and I desire that the paper which I now present containing the sample and letter referred to in the resolution, may accompany the resolution to the committee.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL TERM.

Mr. WADE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 33) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BROWN and Mr. SUMNER. Let it be read at length.

The Secretary proceeded to read it.

Mr. SUMNER. Let the proposed amendment be read, and not the introductory part of the article.

The Secretary read the proposed constitutional amendment, as follows:

ARTICLE —. The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and shall not again be eligible to that office during the term of his natural life.

In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice President, who shall not again be eligible to the office of President of the United States during the term of his natural life.

Whenever Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, such officer shall not again be eligible to the office of President of the United States during the term of his natural life.

Mr. WADE. The offering of this resolution is no new impulse of mine, for I have been an advocate of the principle contained in it for many years, and I have derived the strong impressions which I entertain on the subject from a very careful observation of the workings of our Government during the period that I have been an observer of them. I believe it has been very rare that we have been able to elect a President of the United States who has not been tempted to use the vast powers intrusted to him according to his own opinions to advance his reelection. And when I say this of the Presidents who have preceded us I say it with no desire to depreciate their merits, but because the Constitution places before them temptations which we can hardly expect human nature to resist, and in the long run it never will resist them. Early in the history of our Government Washington himself, who was exceedingly sagacious respecting its workings, informed the people that in his opinion here was a weakness that ought to be remedied. He saw it early. He saw that a man intrusted with these more than regal powers during the period that he was President might be tempted to use them for his own advancement afterward. Almost all the Presidents who have come after him have in some way felt, and honestly felt, that some such check was needed upon the ambition of man. It is an injunction of more than human wisdom to pray to be relieved from temptation. If I had time I might trace it through all the preceding Administrations and show that this consideration had weighed like gravitation upon the mind of almost every President we have had.

How is it in the present case? I have no doubt that when the Chief Magistracy devolved upon the present incumbent he was perfectly single in his mind, sincere, truthful, and honest in the opinions he entertained. What were some of these opinions? He said, and reiterated it almost every day for nearly two months at the beginning of his administration, that treason was a great crime, that it ought to be punished, that it must be rendered infamous, and that he was the man who would do this. He said it to every delegation that visited him, until the words became stereotyped in the minds of the whole people. How has he performed that pledge? Has he punished anybody? Why, sir, we have the unheard-of spectacle of one of the greatest rebellions that ever cursed mankind, involving more people, more lives, more expense, more disasters than all the rebellions recorded in history, and yet no man has been punished in consequence of it. Something is wrong; or if it is all right, your whole system of punishments and penitentiaries throughout the Union ought to be abolished.

Sir, the President was right when he informed the people that treason was the greatest of crimes and ought to be made odious. Why did he not perform that promise? What has led him to change his position upon these questions? I will not say that the ambition which has tempted all that have gone before him weighed upon his mind to bring it to the conclusions to which he has come; but it is exceedingly singular that so far from rendering treason odious by punishment, he has foisted into the highest and most delicate trusts many of the worst traitors, the leading traitors in the Union. Who else at any period of the world ever thought of taking a rebel, red with the blood of his countrymen, and placing him in the position of a Governor of a State—yes, sir, placing as Governor of a State a man who had sought to overturn not only the government of the State, but of the Union, and had invoked foreign despots to aid and assist him in doing it? Is that the way to make treason odious among mankind?

Now, as to the policy about which we have heard so much, nobody has been able to tell us exactly what that policy was; but we all saw that there was a kind of policy in it that suited every rebel, every copperhead, every enemy of the Government of the United States, both foreign and domestic. As the policy has become developed we all now see precisely what it is, and why it was so pleasing to the ears and to the hearts of all the enemies of the country. It is no less than this: that these States shall suffer nothing and forfeit nothing by the rebellion, but they shall be admitted, unwashed and red with the blood of their countrymen, in full communion with the honest and loyal men of the country in the councils of the nation. What has brought about this change? It all points to this fact, that it will not do to tempt men in this way.

Sir, this policy of bringing these States into the Union with all their rebellion and treason in their hearts is no better than treason itself; for I lay down the rule here, and I defy contradiction, that if there is any man, be he high or low, who is an advocate for bringing unwashed traitors into the councils of the nation, that man is a traitor in his heart; he is an enemy to the nation, to the Government, and nothing can wipe it out. He that invokes the aid of an unrepentant rebel to come into the councils of the nation and participate with us in its administration is no better than a rebel, and he is a rebel at heart.

How does the policy that has now been announced differ from the policy that would be announced in the same place by Jefferson Davis, were he to-morrow placed in the same position? Would he ask any more, and would he ask any less, than that his coconspirators should all be restored to precisely the same position of predominance that they had when they left these Halls? We all know the history of that period when those men in these Halls rebelled. How was it? When they went off they had the Government all in their own hands; and to the eternal infamy of the Democratic party be it said, that, with all their treason on their skirts, in this Senate Chamber there was but one man that I recollect on that side of the Chamber who protested against their treason. They stood faithfully by them during all that period of events that led to the open rupture of war. You may search the Journals of the Senate and of the other House and you will not find a single Democratic vote recorded against the will and measures enjoined upon them by the southern rebels just before they went out of Congress. They had it all their own way. Mr. President, you and I felt more relieved than we ever did on any other occasion when we saw them volunteer to leave these Halls. It was the greatest blunder that treason ever committed. They were infinitely more formidable here than they were in the field. There we could crush them by our superior forces and resources, but here they held us by the help of their serfs, the Democratic party, in perfect subjection. No man of the Democratic party undertook to gainsay whatever measure they proposed, or to protest against what they did. You cannot find it anywhere recorded in the Journals of this body.

Now, sir, suppose they had kept on here just as they are invited to come in now; suppose they had kept right along and had not committed that blunder, but held predominance in Congress and prevented any provision being made by the Government for resisting their treason; you could not have voted a dollar to carry on the war, you could not have enlisted a soldier, you could not have done the first act by which we could defend ourselves, had they not committed that blunder, for the Democratic party here would have stood by them and voted down every measure, as they undertook to vote them down after their masters had gone.

Some gentlemen are very much astonished at the number of constitutional amendments that are offered from time to time. I do not wonder at it at all. This great Government, now floundering through a crisis that never Government encountered before, is tried in all its parts; and if there be any weakness in it, it is revealed by the very difficulties that we encounter and overcome. As a great ship overtaken by a hurricane shows you all the weak spots in it, and shows where the carpenter ought to commence his work, so it is with this great Government. Men see, as it flounders through these difficulties, where the weak spots are, and this one that I seek to mend now is among the most weakening of the deficiencies that exist in the Constitution of our fathers. It is no disparagement to them that we find a century afterward that their work was not complete and adapted to all time to come. It would have been more than a miracle of human wisdom if they had been able to accomplish such an event. It is absurd to suppose that a Constitution that worked well among a people spread over a small extent of country and not more than three millions in number should be in all particulars perfect when the nation had grown up to contain more than thirty millions and had spread over an entire continent. You might just as well expect that cloth cut for an infant would be the pattern for him in all time to come when he had arrived at manhood. There are defects in the Constitution, and this is among the most glaring. All men have seen it; and now let us have the nerve, let us have the resolution to come up and apply the remedy. It is singular that we probably have now an opportunity to do it. It is very rare in the history of nations that an opportunity like this arises. I hope everybody will join with me in this proposition, and the President among the rest; and he will, if he has a spark of patriotism, enjoin it upon us, as General Jackson did, as Washington did, as all the great statesmen that preceded us have done.

Therefore I shall move at a very early period to take up this resolution, and I intend to have the sense of Congress upon it. It is no new proposition emanating with me, but it has had the sanction of the most sagacious and eminent statesmen that ever graced the Halls of Congress or the executive chair. Of all the amendments that have been proposed to the Constitution I have no doubt this is the most conservative—however, I do not like to give it that bad name. It is the great remedy for the evils under which we now labor. I have no doubt about it.

This is all I wish to say about this proposition now. I repeat that I shall call it up at an early day, and I shall enjoin it upon this Senate to carry it through with me; and here I have the satisfaction of believing that I shall have the aid and assistance of all parties, because it is a measure that has heretofore met the approbation of everybody. I move that this joint resolution be printed and laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered if there be no objection.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CRESWELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 157) to protect children of African descent from being enslaved in violation of the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to have that bill read at length.

The Secretary read the bill, which provides that it shall not be lawful in any of the States of the United States where slavery has been abolished since the year 1861, either by State constitutions, legislative enactments, or by the amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery in the United States, to indenture as apprentice any child or children of African descent without the consent first obtained of the parents, or parent if only one be living, guardian, or next friend. Any indenture of a child or children of African descent as negro apprentices since the year 1861 without the consent of parents, or parent if one be living, guardian, or next friend, is declared to be in violation of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery therein, and the indentures null and void. In all cases of indentures of negro apprentices made by any of the courts in the States, if it shall appear on investigation that the consent of the parents, parent, guardian, or next friend was obtained by fraud or misrepresentation, or that the indentures were obtained by fraud or misrepresentation of any kind, or that the age or condition of the child or children indentured as negro apprentices was incorrectly stated in the indenture, then the indentures are to be null and void.

If any person or persons shall continue to hold in slavery in violation of the provisions of this bill, any child or children of African descent who may have been indentured as African apprentices without the consent of the parents, or parent if only one be living, guardian, or next friend, on complaint or information given to any circuit or district court of the United States, or any judge thereof, or to any court organized by the authority of the Freedmen's Bureau of the United States, those courts or judges are to cause to be issued the writ of habeas corpus directed to the person or persons who may be thus unlawfully detaining such apprentices to appear forthwith before such courts or judges, and upon a hearing and a full investigation of all the facts in the case, if they shall find that the child or children are held in violation of this bill, they shall set the apprentice or apprentices free from such slavery, and may impose a fine of not less than $300 nor more than $500 upon the offender, or imprisonment for not more than six months, or both, in the discretion of the court. Nothing in this bill is to apply to the trustees of the poor or to the managers of the houses of refuge of the several States who indenture children of African descent, on the same condition as white children are indentured.

Mr. CRESWELL. I ask the reference of this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. It was so referred.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is the bill returned by the President of the United States, with his objections to its passage, it being Senate bill No. 60, to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees," and for other purposes; and the question is: Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States notwithstanding?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I propose to submit to the Senate an argument in support of the President's veto of the act to increase the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau. This act, and the law to which it is proposed as an amendment, are to "extend to refugees and freedmen in all parts of the United States," and authorize the President to "divide the section of country containing such refugees and freedmen into districts, each containing one or more States, not to exceed twelve in number, to appoint an assistant commissioner for each of said districts; or to detail from the Army a Commissioner and assistant commissioners."

The Commissioner, with the approval of the President, is required "to divide each district into a number of sub-districts not to exceed the number of counties, or parishes in each State, and shall assign to each sub-district at least one agent." "Each assistant commissioner may employ not exceeding six clerks," &c.; "the President, through the War Department and the Commissioner, shall extend military protection over the employés, agents, and officers of the bureau."

"The Secretary of War may direct such issues of provisions, clothing, fuel, and other supplies, including medical stores and transportation, and afford such aid, medicine, or otherwise, as he may deem needful for the immediate and temporary shelter and supply of destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen, their wives and children."

The President is authorized to reserve from sale or from settlement under the homestead or preemption laws, and to set apart for the use of freedmen and loyal refugees, unoccupied public lands in Florida, Mississippi, Arkansas, Alabama, and Louisiana, not exceeding in all three million acres (good) land; and the Commissioner, under the direction of the President, shall cause the same, from time to time, to be allotted and assigned, in parcels not exceeding forty acres each, to the loyal refugees and freedmen, who will be protected in the use and enjoyment thereof, for such term of time and such annual rent as may be agreed on between the Commissioner and such refugees and freedmen—they to have the right of preemption at the end of the term. The possessory titles, granted in pursuance of General Sherman's field order of January 16, 1865, to a large quantity of the best Sea Island cotton lands are confirmed for three years, which will result in a fee-simple estate.

The Commissioner, under the direction of the President, is required to procure "in the name of the United States, by grant or purchase within the districts aforesaid, such lands," without limit as to quantity, "as may be required for refugees and freedmen dependent on the Government, and he shall provide or cause to be built suitable asylums and schools for them."

The seventh section provides "that in any State or district in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion, and in which there are discriminations to the prejudice of negroes, mulattoes, freedmen, or refugees in the right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to have full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and estate, or whenever they, or any of them, are subjected to any other or different punishment, pains, or penalties for the commission of any act or offense than are prescribed for white persons committing like acts or offenses, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, through the Commissioner, to extend military protection and jurisdiction over all cases affecting such persons so discriminated against."

Section eight makes it a misdemeanor to deprive any negro, mulatto, freedman, refugee, or other person, on account of race or color, of any civil right secured to white persons; or to inflict on them any other or different punishment than white persons are subject to for the commission of like acts and offenses; and for such misdemeanor it declares punishment of fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

This section also makes it the duty "of the officers and agents of this bureau to take jurisdiction of and hear and determine all offenses committed against its provisions" "and also of all cases affecting negroes, mulattoes, freedmen, refugees, or other persons who are discriminated against in any of the particulars mentioned in the preceding section, under such rules and regulations as the President of the United States, through the War Department, shall prescribe."

This is a synopsis of the act. It organizes the largest and most expensive eleemosynary institution that ever existed, and adopts all the negro population of the United States, numbering about four and a half millions, as their wards; and it provides that the support of any of them may, as a large portion of them necessarily must, become a charge upon it. Four thousand officers, diffused over the United States, with an aggregate of more than five million dollars of salary, may be put into the service of this institution. Its annual expenditure of money will probably be not less than $50,000,000, and could, to carry out its full purpose, be pushed to five times that amount; and the quantity of land required for it may be reasonably estimated at not less than thirty million acres.

But these are not by far the gravest and most objectionable features of the act. It establishes a military despotism in every State into which it may be carried, where "the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion," and sustains it by the whole military power of the United States. It confers upon the officers of this bureau extraordinary and dangerous legislative, executive, and judicial powers, and requires them by force of arms to trample down all State laws which deny to negroes and mulattoes an equality of the civil rights enumerated in it with white people; and to wrest negroes and mulattoes from all punishment different from what is declared by law against white persons for the same acts and offenses; and to substitute for the laws thus to be set aside an arbitrary code to be concocted in the War Office. It makes the enforcement of any State laws which make distinctions between the civil rights and punishments of negroes and mulattoes and white persons a high misdemeanor, and denounces against the State officers who enforce those laws heavy punishment, both by fine and imprisonment. It forces all causes of suit between the negro and white persons from the civil law and civil judge and juries, and requires them to be tried by the officers of this bureau, according to its military code. And it protects by United States bayonets "all employés, agents, and officers of this bureau" from any responsibility by the civil law and courts for any and every wrong perpetrated by them, however enormous.

Never before in this country did Congress attempt such legislation, and where is there any authority for it? It must be found in the Constitution, or the act can have no validity. We propose to examine that general question. The States and their governments existed before the United States and the General Government. The States and their governments cooperated in forming the Constitution and Government of the United States, and without such cooperation they could not have been formed. Before the adoption of the Constitution the States were, each for itself, possessed of all sovereignty; but by that instrument their people delegated a portion of their sovereignty, and organized it into a general but limited Government for the people of all the States; and the sovereignty with which they parted, and the form of the Government they instituted, are expressed in the Constitution. Every principle and every power of which they have become dispossessed, and their adjustment into a national Government, were written down in the Constitution. Neither the States nor their governments were dissolved by the formation of the Government of the United States; but they remained as they had previously existed, organized and possessed of all sovereignty and power, except the limited amount which they had parted with, and which is named in the Constitution.

The General Government was not only so framed as to leave the States in existence, but it was to some extent founded upon them, and for its existence and operation requires their cooperation, as Senators in Congress are to be chosen by their Legislatures, and "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature may direct," its presidential electors. If the States were to refuse to perform these functions it would bring the Government of the United States to an end. The Constitution of the United States, and the acts of Congress made in pursuance of it, are the supreme law of the land. But every act of Congress must be authorized by a power conferred upon it by the Constitution to pass that act. Within its constitutional sphere, even though it be in conflict with any or all the State governments, the authority of the United States Government is paramount and supreme; but outside of the powers delegated to the United States by the Constitution, and not prohibited by it to the States, they are paramount and supreme. All political sovereignty is thus divided between the United States and the States; and the maintenance of our complex system of blended governments, national and State, require that all the powers and sovereignty apportioned to either shall be held inviolate by the other; and if it is disadjusted by the encroachments of either, it is the highest duty of the people of the United States to readjust it.

These principles have often been pronounced in the opinions of the Supreme Court; and all of them are very clearly stated by Chief Justice Marshall in the opinion in the case of McC

Cullough vs. The State of Maryland, delivered by him. We will quote several passages from that rich mine of constitutional law:

"In America the powers of sovereignty are divided between the Government of the Union and those of the States. They are each sovereign with respect to the objects committed to it, neither with respect to the objects committed to the other."

"This Government is acknowledged by all to be one of enumerated powers. The principle that it can exercise only the powers granted to it would seem too apparent to have required to be enforced by all those arguments which its enlightened friends, while it was depending before the people, found it necessary to urge."

"The tenth amendment, which was framed for the purpose of quieting the excessive jealousies which had been excited, declares that 'the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.'"

Another great principle is thus stated in that opinion:

"The power of creating a corporation, though appertaining to sovereignty, is not like the power of making war or levying taxes, or of regulating commerce, a great substantive and independent power, which cannot be implied as incidental to other powers, or used as the means of executing them. It is never the end for which other powers are exercised, but a means by which other objects are accomplished."

"The power of creating a corporation is never used for its own sake, but for the purpose of effecting something else. No sufficient reason is therefore perceived why it may not pass as incidental to those powers which are expressly given, (to collect taxes, pay the debts of the United States, &c.) if it be a direct mode of executing them."

Again, he says:

"We admit, all must admit, the powers of the Government are limited. But we think a sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the national Legislature the discretion with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to the end, which are not prohibited, but consonant to the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional."

Also:

"Should Congress, in the execution of its powers, adopt measures which are prohibited by the Constitution; or should Congress, under the pretext of executing its powers, pass laws for the accomplishment of objects not intrusted to the Government, it would become the painful duty of this tribunal, should a case requiring such a decision come before it, to say that such an act was not the law of the land."

The American people are more indebted to Mr. Madison than any other man for their Constitution; and they are under not less obligation to Chief Justice Marshall for his able and luminous expositions of its great principles. If this act is examined in the clear light shed upon it by the principles stated in the extracts from this imperishable opinion which we have here presented, a correct judgment on the question of its constitutionality can be formed by all men of common honesty and understanding. But preliminary to this examination we will consider the two sources of power which its friends contend give authority to Congress to pass it:

I. From this provision of the Constitution: "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States." The correct interpretation of this clause, as to the persons comprehended by it, would seem to be without difficulty. It applies to two classes of persons: 1. The citizens of a State, who, without changing their residence, go temporarily into another State, in transitu or on business or pleasure. 2. The citizens of any State who may remove their residence into another State. Both these classes become entitled to the privileges and immunities of American citizens in the several States, but the precise extent and the particular kinds of those privileges and immunities are questions not of easy solution. This provision of the Constitution has been in a few cases before the United States circuit and two or three of the State courts for their considerations; and they have ruled definitely and unanimously that it does not extend to the citizens of any State who have not changed their residence or gone into another State for some temporary purpose. (See 3 Harris & McHenry, 554; 4 Wash. C. R., 580; 6 Pick., 92.)

But this bill by its terms applies to all the inhabitants of the United States, without regard to race or color, including the great mass of the people, those who have not changed their residence from one State to another, nor gone into another State for any temporary purpose, nor are claiming any privilege or immunity of an American citizen in any other State than the one in which they reside. Consequently this provision of the Constitution, allowing to it the broadest application which can be claimed under its language, would only authorize an act of Congress that would embrace but an inconsiderable portion of the people and their privileges and immunities, when this act, by its terms, is made to comprehend all. It is therefore palpably obnoxious to the objection of being in conflict with the Constitution. It is indeed flagrantly so, because Congress has no constitutional power to bring a single person in the United States, or his property or rights, under the provisions or operation of this act. I think this last position will be made good by my subsequent remarks.

II. But the second section of the last amendment of the Constitution is mostly relied upon by the friends of this measure as conferring upon Congress the power to pass it. That amendment is in these words:

"Sec. 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist in the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction."

"Sec. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

The second section invests Congress with no more power than it would have possessed without it. Paragraph eighteen, section eight, article one, provides:

"The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof."

This provision gives to Congress the same faculty of ancillary legislation to execute powers that might be conferred on the Government of the United States by all after amendments of the Constitution, as to execute those given and enumerated by the Constitution in the form in which it was first adopted; and it invests Congress with the same and equal power to pass auxiliary laws to give force and effect to the first section of this amendment that the second section does.

Between the words "Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the first section of article thirteen" and the words "Congress shall have power to enforce that section by appropriate legislation," I know no difference of sense and meaning. If there be any, the first import the larger power. "To execute" is to carry into complete effect; "to enforce" is to urge on.

They both confer this incidental power; but any legislation to be legitimate under either must be appropriate and consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution; and that character of legislation, to execute the first section of this amendment, would be authorized by both.

The first section simply abolishes slavery and involuntary servitude at that time, and inhibits them, prospectively, in the United States and every place subject to their jurisdiction. It neither does nor attempts to do anything more. It does not directly and positively give freedom to the slaves; that is done consequentially by the abolition of slavery. Slavery and freedom as here used are American terms, and import definite American ideas; and in the American sense are they to be treated. Slavery is the state of entire legal subjection of one person to the will of another, and freedom is the total absence of such subjection from a person. Whatever force entirely and permanently annihilates that subjection of a person, and remits him from the will of his owner to his own will, to govern and control himself, both abolishes his slavery and gives him his freedom. Slavery is his individual personal condition of entire subjection to the will of another; his freedom is his personal, permanent deliverance from that subjection, and his protection by the law in this condition.

The first section of the amendment, having no other object or effect than to abolish all existing slavery and its prevention in the future, they are the only ends which would authorize any incidental and auxiliary legislation, and such legislation must be "appropriate to those ends," "plainly adapted to them," "most suitable, fit, and proper to give them effect;" "it must not be prohibited, but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution." "It must not, under the pretext of executing" the first section of this amendment, "be in fact to effect objects not intrusted to the Federal Government by the Constitution." These are the tests, according to Chief Justice Marshall, of all such legislation. Unless this act can stand each and every one of them, it cannot, even with the approval of the President, become the law. Let us examine how it can sustain these tests.

This amendment of the Constitution does not enumerate the power to establish a Freedmen's Bureau as a congressional power; it does not expressly confer on Congress the power to create a Freedmen's Bureau. Then, if such a power exist, like the power to establish a bank, it is an implied power. It is not a "substantive, independent power," for the execution of which other and incidental powers may be invoked; but it is itself an incidental power, to be used only to execute some other and an express or enumerated power. All concede that the only express or enumerated power to execute or enforce which the Freedmen's Bureau can be claimed to be auxiliary is expressed by the first section of the amendment:

"Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as punishment for crime, shall exist within the United States." &c.

Then the power of Congress to organize this bureau is implied and incidental; it is not for the purpose of creating the bureau itself, but because such a machinery "is necessary and proper," "appropriate," to enforce the abolition and prohibition of slavery in the United States. It might be plausibly, if not truthfully, argued that no legislation whatever was necessary to execute or enforce that section; that of itself it fully and completely abolished all existing, and prohibited all future, slavery in the United States; and that every being whose rights under it were infringed, would, by the principles of the common law, be entitled to redress, both in the form of civil suit and penal prosecution. But, if auxiliary legislation be necessary, it cannot appropriately and constitutionally do more than, to give to injured parties efficient legal protection, by suit and penal and criminal proceedings in court. No human laws can prevent the rights guaranteed by this provision of the Constitution from being invaded. All that is possible is to furnish the injured appropriate and constitutional redress.

It is an inflexible rule of construction of all writings, instruments, laws, treaties, and constitutions, that a clearly expressed provision shall not be nullified or restricted by any implication, but shall have its full effect according to the language embodied in it.

Article ten of the Constitution reads:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

Yet this Freedmen's Bureau act, passed with no warrant of authority but the implied incidental power to enforce the first section of the amendment, nullifies this provision of the Constitution, by absorbing all the essential sovereignty and rights of the States, expressly, and so emphatically guaranteed by it.

The executive power only is vested by the Constitution in the President of the United States in the first section of article two; and the first section of article three says:

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."

Section two reads:

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States," &c., "between citizens of the different States," &c.

And section one, article one, provides—

"All legislative powers herein granted, shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives," &c.

All these principles, established by express language, are flagrantly infringed by this act, in these respects:

1. It authorizes the President to detail "a Commissioner and assistant commissioners for the bureau from the Army; and to assign an officer of the Army, or an enlisted man, to act as agent in each sub-district; which officers and military men are invested by it with judicial powers and functions.

2. No appeal, writ of error, or transfer from the judgments of this bureau is permitted to the supreme or inferior courts of the United States, even though the case may arise under the Constitution or the laws of the United States, and be between citizens of different States.

3. It makes it "the duty of the officers and agents of this bureau to take jurisdiction of and to hear and determine all offenses committed against its provisions, and also of all cases affecting negroes, mulattoes, freedmen, refugees, or other persons, who are discriminated against in any of the particulars mentioned in the act."

4. It authorizes the President, through the War Department, to disperse with all laws, whether of the States or the United States, and to substitute such rules and regulations as he by that agency, in the possession of absolute and irresponsible power, may devise.

The third paragraph of section two, article three, provides:

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed," &c.

Article five defines the mode of accusation for crimes, and prescribes a "trial by due process of law," &c.

Article six declares:

"In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed," &c.

Article seven provides:

"In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law."

This last provision has been construed by the Supreme Court in a very careful opinion announced by Justice Marshall, in which it is ruled that in all civil cases in which the matter in contest is above twenty dollars, either party is entitled to a jury in every court into which it may be taken; and that this principle extends to all subjects of suit of which courts of equity and admiralty have not the exclusive jurisdiction. (See Weston vs. Council of City of Charleston, 2 Pet., 440, 449.)

The inestimable right of trial by jury, so prized by our ancestors, so sedulously guarded and assured to every person by those express provisions of the Constitution, is wholly repudiated, both in criminal and civil cases, by this act requiring them to be tried by the officers and agents of this military bureau; and for the law is substituted the will of a military despot. But this measure is not merely to secure freedom now and prospectively to the negro population of the United States. Besides being flagitiously unconstitutional in all its principal provisions, it is not as a means suitable, fit, appropriate, plainly, and directly adapted to those ends. Under the pretext of enforcing the first section of the amendment, the practical operation would be unfriendly, hostile to its true and honest purposes; and it has other objects altogether alien to them, transcending the powers of Congress and the Federal Government, and subversive of the Constitution and the liberties of the people.

It has been devised by the leaders of the party in power as a most potent, extensive, and pervading party machinery; and while holding out to the negro the magic lure of liberty and homes and largesses at the cost of the white people of the United States, the design is to reenslave the freedmen and to reduce the white race of the southern States to a slavery even lower than that of the blacks, and with the aid of general negro suffrage to hold them permanently in that condition. If the negro is free in law and fact, why is he not in the enjoyment of the free will, the unfettered conduct and action of the white man? The plea that this bureau is necessary to protect the freedman from his late master is false, and those who make statements to that effect are holding places, public or private, in connection with this bureau or are plundering under its cover. These testimonies, as a general rule, originate in mercenary sources and are not entitled to any credit. Their former owners are a much surer reliance for justice, protection, kindness, and sympathy to their late slaves than this bureau, its officers and agents, and the plunderers who are living and fattening by it.

The white people of the South generally, almost universally, submit to the fact that the negroes are permanently free. The two races are living in the same country, and so must continue. They know each other better than they or either of them are known to the people of the free States. The white race, either natives of the South or from other localities, will be the proprietors of the land, and the black its cultivators; such is their destiny. The late owners and their slaves know, or would soon learn and recognize the fact, that mutual confidence and good will are essential to the welfare of both races. The white man would be taught that he could win these from the black man only by justice, kindness, and respectful treatment; and the latter would not be slow in understanding that a diligent and faithful performance of his duties to his employer, and an obliging disposition toward him and his family, would not only secure his rights, but also a generous sympathy. The general good of each State would require the establishment of such relations, and their legislation and policy would be faithfully and wisely applied to establish and perpetuate them. If Congress would refrain from all intermeddling with these matters, over which it has not a particle of legitimate authority, and would remit them to the respective States, where alone they properly belong, they would soon be adjusted upon a basis combining justice, humanity, and the soundest policy.

But it is the fixed purpose of the party which sustains the Freedmen's Bureau to prevent the late masters and the late slaves from coming to any friendly settlement. That party has two cardinal purposes to which it intends to appropriate the freedman: first, by military coercion to work the cotton and sugar lands of the southern States for the benefit of its section and of those who constitute the party; second, to confer on the freedman the right of suffrage and constrain them to vote for the perpetuation of their party power, and, with the aid of these allies, to control the elections in the late slave States and hold possession of the Government of the United States. To achieve these grand party ends the Freedmen's Bureau, with its enormous and irresponsible military powers, is a necessary engine. By its great largesses of lands, homes, and supplies it fixes the entire negro masses of the United States in the interests of the northern radical party; and by its diffused and vigorous military government it will hold together, control, and give direction to all their efficient labor. Its various, extensive, and arbitrary powers, grasping in its embrace the whole of both races in the late slave States and their property, business, and concerns, and especially their relations with each other, will enable it to depress the whites, to favor and hold up the blacks, to flatter the vanity and excite the insolence of the latter, to mortify and irritate the former, and perpetuate between them enmity and strife.

This is the state of relations between the two races which the Freedmen's Bureau will bring about and protract, to afford a pretext, in the absence of war and military necessity, for its continuance. The law of the last session organizing it, provided for its continuance only twelve months after the war should have closed; more than eight months of that time has passed, but the bureau is too important a party power to be allowed such an early termination. On its limited scale, it has shown great capabilities; and, magnified as it has been by this act, its efficiency for party service will be proportionably increased. The same real motives of having the freedman's labor in cotton and sugar fields and his vote at elections will continue indefinitely, and the operations of the bureau itself will furnish the simulated necessity of protection of the freedmen against their former masters for its continuance. In that way the design of the party is to make it a permanent institution. It has been clearly shown that this act is prohibited by the Constitution, inconsistent with both its letter and spirit—that under the pretext of executing another power, Congress has passed it for the accomplishment of objects not intrusted to the United States Government. Each and all of these objections to any act of Congress, Chief Justice Marshall has declared, would make it the painful duty of the Supreme Court to pronounce it "not to be the law of the land."

This act is unconstitutional also because it intervenes military power to prevent the officers and agents of this bureau from being held to any responsibility in civil courts, State or Federal, however wrongful, illegal, and criminal their acts may have been. If it be unconstitutional it is utterly void, and furnishes to those who may attempt to execute it no ground of defense if they should be sued or criminally prosecuted for what they may do under it. The great constitutional principle, that an act of Congress in conflict with the Constitution must yield to it, and is of no validity whatever, was first enunciated by the Supreme Court, Chief Justice Marshall being the organ, in the case of Marbury vs. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, since which it has never been questioned. It is strange that it ever was controverted in the face of the provision:

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof," &c., "shall be the supreme law of the land."

This act, therefore, as a whole and in all its parts, is a flagitious infraction of the Constitution; and yet, under covert of it, the employees, agents, and officers of this bureau may commit the most outrageous wrongs, the most shocking crimes, and the President is required by it, "through the War Department and the Commissioner," to extend to them "military jurisdiction and protection."

Congress has no power to pass laws to organize a vast system of poor-houses, to endow them, and to establish and support in them the paupers of the United States, black or white; or to subject the whole people of the United States, black and white, or either race, and their civil rights, property, contracts, offenses, and punishments, their suits and legal responsibilities, to the civil, much less to the military authorities of the United States; all those matters are by the Constitution reserved to the States respectively; and in virtue of their original and ungranted sovereignty they have exclusive jurisdiction over them; and yet this act proposes to usurp absolute power as to this whole mass of reserved State rights, and to govern them by a military despotism to be organized in this bureau.

If the second section of the amendment could be tortured to give some semblance of authority to pass such an act, it could be claimed with any show of reason to extend only to the slaves freed by the first section, and not to those already free. This section was intended for and only operated upon slavery and the enslaved, not upon freedom and the free. In 1860 the total free negro population of the United States was 488,005, and it may be assumed to have been 500,000 at the commencement of the rebellion. Maryland, Missouri, and Tennessee had liberated all their slaves before the adoption of the amendment. It is claimed by the friends of this measure that the slaves of the rebel States had been made free by the President's proclamation or having enlisted into the Army or by being the wives and children of those who had. In Kentucky about 35,000 slaves have become soldiers, and their wives and children were estimated by officers connected with the negro recruiting in that State to be 75,000. According to this computation there were about 140,000 slaves in Kentucky, not more, when this amendment of the Constitution went into effect, and could not have been 500,000 in the whole United States; and on this small amount of negro population only, by the principles contended for by its friends, is there even a pretext to make this act operate; and yet by its terms it extends not only to the whole negro, but also to the entire white population of the United States.

The original thirteen, as colonies and States, were all slaveholding for more than one hundred years, and that continued to be the condition of six of them down to this great insurrection. Nine of the new States adopted slavery, and with that institution were admitted into the Union as having a republican form of government, in accordance with the requisition of the Constitution. It was States holding slaves as property that formed the Constitution, and incorporated the provision that the United States should guaranty to all the States a republican form of government, and they each continued one of the United States, adhering to slavery as long as it was their will, and their republican form of government was never questioned. The position that a slaveholding State could not have a republican form of government in the sense of the Constitution is one of the senseless extravagances of the day.

Every slaveholding State, throughout the entire period of its continuance of that institution, had a mode established by its laws to enable the owners of slaves, by their own act, to emancipate them. In all the States but three, it is a well-known fact that the emancipation of a slave conferred on him no political right whatever; and we have met with no evidence that it had any such component part or consequence in either of those three States. Whenever a slave was manumitted, he became entitled to some civil rights by the laws of the State; but their number and extent varied in different States, and in none were they a part of the act of manumission. The deliverance of the slave from subjection to the will of all other persons, and the guarantee by the laws of that deliverance, are all there is of emancipation. His acquisition of civil rights is altogether a distinct matter; and until the adoption of this amendment of the Constitution, the power of each State over both subjects had been exclusive and sovereign, and it still continues so over the matter of civil rights.

Every State had some population that were neither slaves nor citizens, to which it extended some civil rights, but the quantum was not uniform or stable. This concession was determined by each State for itself, and the right to make it more or less, or to alter it according to the varying condition or sense of policy and justice, from time to time, was never doubted. On their emancipation, slaves, by general laws, were remitted to all the civil rights of that portion of the population of the State who were not citizens, unless some of them were withheld by special enactments or inflexible custom. Intermarriage with white persons, commingling with them in hotels, theaters, steamboats, and other civil rights and privileges, were always forbid to free negroes, until Massachusetts has recently achieved the unenviable notoriety of making herself an exceptionable case.

These observations are equally applicable to the general systems of emancipation of some of the States, acting by their Legislatures or conventions.

But under the power to enforce the simple abolition and prohibition of slavery in the United States, the frantic friends of the negro claim that Congress has the authority and is bound to pass laws to secure to all the negroes in the United States farms of forty acres of good land, build houses upon them; to found churches and schools, and furnish them with preachers and teachers; to build and maintain the requisite number of poor-houses for that whole population, to supply the indigent and destitute with provisions, clothing, and medical service, and all with transportation; to secure the negro an equality of civil rights and disabilities, and of pains, penalties, and punishments; to guaranty to him suffrage in elections, and to give evidence in courts; and as a necessary sequel, eligibility to all the offices by which the laws are made, adjudged, and executed, State and Federal courts, inferior and supreme, shrievalties and marshalcies, governorships, and presidency. And to hold the negro up to this high estate, they say power enables and duty demands of Congress to organize a military autocracy in this Freedmen's Bureau, with absolute will to repudiate the laws of Congress and the States, the courts Federal and State, the supreme law of the land, the Constitution of the United States; and itself to absorb all political sovereignty and powers, legislative, executive, and judicial, concerning the negro generally, and particularly in all his relations with the white man.

This sketch falls below the enormity of the "act to increase the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau." It requires madness, or something worse, to pronounce such a measure just, wise, or constitutional.

The President has put his veto upon it. This power originated in Rome while Rome was yet a republic. It was raised up by the people, and by them vested in their tribunes to forbid the Senate to pass improper laws. In our Government it has a similar office. It is confided to the President, the tribune of the people of the United States, and chosen by them. It is a constitutional check upon Congress when they are about to pass unjust, mischievous, oppressive, and unconstitutional laws. It is one of the great defenses of the Constitution and popular liberty. It has been intervened on this occasion to check an act unparalleled in its enormous and profligate expenditure of the public money, in its grinding oppression of eight million white people, and in the number and enormity of its aggressions upon the Constitution. An act, the authors of which have dissolved the Union by excluding the eleven States which are to be enslaved by it from all representation in the two Houses of Congress, and which could not be passed if those States were represented. Never was there an occasion or a measure which so imperatively demanded the presidential veto.

MR. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, it was with surprise and profound regret that I read the extraordinary message of the President of the United States, returning with his objections the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees," and for other purposes. It has been my desire that the various departments of the Government should harmonize in the restoration of all the States to their full constitutional relations in the Union. I have sought to forward such measures as would protect the loyal refugees and freedmen in the rebellious States, and would, as I supposed, harmonize with the views of the Executive. He had proposed to the rebel States, as conditions precedent to their resumption of practical relations with the United States, "that civil rights should be secured by laws applicable alike to whites and blacks," and had declared in his message, delivered to us at the commencement of the session, that "we shall but fulfill our duties as legislators by according equal and exact justice to all men, special privileges to none." The only object and design of the bill was to secure these rights to all men; and I am greatly surprised that a bill designed for such a purpose should have been returned by the Executive with a statement that it is "as inconsistent with the actual condition of the country as it is at variance with the Constitution of the United States." Having taken a somewhat active part in the passage of this bill through the Senate, I feel called upon to vindicate myself from the charge of having urged upon the Senate a bill so unconstitutional and so inconsistent with the actual condition of the country as this is now declared to be.

What is this amendment to the Freedmen's Bureau bill? It is not a measure establishing a bureau, but merely amendatory of an act already in existence; nor does it, as seems to be supposed by some, materially enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau as it already exists. It is an entire misapprehension to suppose that such was the object of the bill or such its effect. It does little more than give the sanction of law to what is already being done without any statute authorizing it. The Freedmen's Bureau, as I have said, already exists. Courts are held by the Freedmen's Bureau throughout the entire region of country where that bureau is in operation. Under the military authority laws inconsistent, as is believed, with the safety of the Government and incompatible with military operations are set aside at this time in eleven States. The object of the bill was to continue in existence the Freedmen's Bureau—not as a permanent institution. Any such intent was disavowed during the discussion of the bill. It is true, no time is expressly limited in the bill itself when it shall cease to operate, nor is it customary to insert such a clause in a law; but it is declared that the bill shall operate until otherwise provided by law. It is known that the Congress of the United States assembles every year, and no one supposed that this bill was to establish a bureau to be ingrafted upon the country as a permanent institution; far from it. Nor is it a bill that is intended to go into the States and take control of the domestic affairs of the States.

The original act and this amendatory bill together were simply designed to protect refugees and freedmen from persecution, aid them to find employment, and to provide, not for four million emancipated slaves and millions of refugees, but only for the indigent, for those who were unable to take care of themselves, and that temporarily, until provision could be made so that they could become self-supporting. In consequence of the war, thousands of Union men had been driven from their homes all over the South, and particularly was this the case in Tennessee. They had been stripped of their property. Women and children had fled destitute from their homes. They had neither food to eat nor clothes to wear. They flocked around our armies, and during the whole progress of the war they were fed by our supplies. So also with the freedmen. Congress at an early day passed a law declaring free all slaves who should come within the lines of our Army. They came flying within our lines, without clothing, without hats, oftentimes wounded, foot-sore and distressed. Many of them entered our ranks to fight for the cause of the country, and others we fed and clothed from our stores.

While the war was progressing, and while these people were flocking around our Army, on the 3d of March, 1865, not yet one year ago, the Congress of the United States passed a law to create a special department of the military establishment whose duty it should be to look to their pressing wants. That was called the Freedmen's Bureau, and officers were assigned chiefly from the Army to take charge of it. Since that time the conflict of arms has ceased, but there are still upon our hands some of these destitute people who must be provided for—a far less number than would have been upon our hands if no system had been devised for taking care of them, for finding them employment, for settling them upon tracts of land wherever it could be done; and I undertake to say that there has been saved to the Government millions of money by the establishment of a system through which employment was found for these people, and they became self-supporting who otherwise would have been entirely dependent on the bounty of the Government for support.

Since this Freedmen's Bureau was organized an amendment has been adopted to the Constitution of the United States declaring that slavery shall no longer exist within the jurisdiction of the United States. By virtue of that enactment millions of slaves have become free. They have become free in the midst of a hostile population. They have become free without any of this world's goods, not owning even the hats upon their heads or the coats upon their backs, without supplies of any kind, not knowing often where to obtain the next meal to save them from starvation. Something must be done to protect them in their new rights, to find employment for the able-bodied, and take care of the suffering; and the Freedmen's Bureau, as originally established and now proposed to be amended, was designed to do that something—not by furnishing food and clothing for all formerly in slavery. Most of them, with the aid of the bureau, have been able to provide for themselves. The number of indigent freedmen receiving supplies has been comparatively few, and in many instances less than the number of white refugees receiving assistance in the same locality, as I shall presently show.

The President in his veto message—and I design to treat it candidly and without any feeling, for I have no other object in view than to adopt such measures as shall best tend to promote the peace and happiness of the whole country—says:

"I might call to mind, in advance of these objections, that there is no immediate necessity for the proposed measure. The act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, which was approved in the month of March last, has not yet expired. It was thought stringent and extensive enough for the purpose in view in time of war."

Now, sir, when will that act expire, and what was it? It provided in its first section—

"That there is hereby established in the War Department, to continue during the present war of rebellion and for one year thereafter, a Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands."

By the terms of the act it was to continue "during the present war of rebellion and for one year thereafter." Now, when did the war of rebellion cease? So far as the conflict of arms is concerned we all admit that the war of rebellion ceased when the last rebel army laid down its arms, and that was some time in the month of May when the rebel army in Texas surrendered to the Union forces. I do not hold that the consequences of the war are over. I do not understand that peace is restored with all its consequences. We have not yet escaped from the evils inflicted by the war. Peace and harmony are not yet restored, but the war of rebellion is over, and this bureau must expire in May next, according to the terms of the act that was passed on the 3d of March, 1865, and according to the views of the President as expressed in his veto message.

The President says:

"The bill proposes to establish, by authority of Congress, military jurisdiction over all parts of the United States containing refugees and freedmen."

Sir, I desire to speak respectfully of the Executive, but I would like to know where in that bill is any provision extending military jurisdiction over all parts of the United States containing refugees and freedmen? The bill contains no such clause. It is a misapprehension of the bill. The clause of the bill upon that subject is this:

"And the President of the United States, through the War Department and the Commissioner, shall extend military jurisdiction and protection over all employes, agents, and officers of this bureau in the exercise of the duties imposed or authorized by this act or the act to which this is additional."

Is not the difference manifest to everybody between a bill that extends military jurisdiction over the officers and employes of the bureau and a bill which should extend military jurisdiction over all parts of the United States containing refugees and freedmen? This bill makes the Freedmen's Bureau a part of the War Department. It makes its officers and agents amenable to the Rules and Articles of War. But does that extend jurisdiction over the whole country where they are? How do they differ from any other portion of the Army of the United States? The Army of the United States, as every one knows, is governed by the Rules and Articles of War, wherever it may be, whether in Indiana or in Florida, and all persons in the Army and a part of the military establishment are subject to these Rules and Articles of War; but did anybody ever suppose that the whole country where they were was under military jurisdiction? If a company of soldiers are stationed at one of the forts in New York harbor. the officers and soldiers of that company are subject to military jurisdiction; but was it ever supposed that the people of the State of New York were thereby placed under military jurisdiction? It is an entire misapprehension of the provisions of the bill. It extends military jurisdiction nowhere, it merely places under jurisdiction the persons belonging to the Freedmen's Bureau who, nearly all of them, are now under military jurisdiction. The Commissioner at the head of that bureau is an officer of the Army of the United States and under military jurisdiction. I believe every assistant commissioner is an officer of the United States Army and under military jurisdiction. But the bill does not authorize the President, if he thinks proper, instead of detailing military officers, to appoint civilians in some cases; and in case he does appoint civilians, then by the provisions I have read these civilians subject themselves to military jurisdiction and are entitled to military protection in the performance of the duties imposed by this act.

But passing over that objection, which I think I have sufficiently answered, the next which I will notice is the statement of the President that "the country is to be divided into districts and sub-districts, and the number of salaried agents to be employed may be equal to the number of counties or parishes in all the States where freedmen and refugees are to be found."

Now, sir, what is the provision of the bill on this subject? For a great deal seems to be made out of this objection urged here in the Senate, published to the country, and now reiterated in the veto message of the President, that the bill makes it necessary to appoint a large number of salaried officers and agents throughout the country, and it is said to be very objectionable upon that ground. I have already stated that a single officer need not be employed other than those we now have. I have already stated that it is in the power and discretion of the President to detail from the Army officers to perform all the duties of the Freedmen's Bureau, and in case they are detailed the bill provides that they shall serve without any additional compensation or allowance. But, sir, is it necessary, or was it ever contemplated, that there should be an officer or agent of the Freedmen's Bureau in every county and every parish where refugees and freedmen are to be found? By no means. What is the bill upon that subject? The second section provides that—

"The Commissioner, with the approval of the President, and when the same shall be necessary for the operations of the bureau, may divide each district into a number of sub-districts, not to exceed the number of counties or parishes in such district."

Does this make it imperative upon the President to appoint an agent in each county and parish? It authorizes him "when the same shall be necessary for the operations of the bureau;" not otherwise. He has no authority under the bill to appoint a single agent unless it is necessary for the operations of the bureau, and then he can only appoint so many as may be needed. Sir, it never entered the mind, I venture to say, of a single advocate of this bill that the President of the United States would so abuse the authority intrusted to him as to station an agent in every county in these States; but it was apprehended that there might be localities in some of these States where the prejudice and hostility of the white population and the former masters were such toward the negroes that it would be necessary to have an agent in every county in that locality for their protection; and in order to give the President the necessary discretion, where this should be requisite, the bill authorized, when it was necessary for the operations of the bureau, the appointment of an agent in each county or parish; and the word "parish" was used to designate those districts of country in the State of Louisiana which are not known as counties, but as parishes, there being in that State no county organizations.

I should have been very glad, and I think I may say the committee who reported this bill originally to the Senate would have been glad, if we could have limited the officials in the law to a far less number of agents than it is possible to employ under it. But in order to vest the President with sufficient power in some localities, it was necessary, legislating by general law, to give him much larger power than would be necessary in other localities. And yet now this bill is arraigned, and it is said that "the country is to be divided into districts and sub-districts, and the number of salaried agents to be employed may be equal to the number of counties or parishes in all the United States where freedmen and refugees are to be found."

Sir, the country is not to be divided, I undertake to say, into districts and sub-districts unless the President of the United States finds it necessary to do so for the protection of these people; and if the law should be abused in that respect, it would be because he abused the discretion vested in him by Congress, and not because the law required it. It makes no such requirement. The original law required that there be appointed one Commissioner and ten assistant commissioners, and the amendatory act which the President has vetoed authorized the appointment of twelve assistant commissioners, two more than the present law. But as to this division into sub-districts and the appointment of this innumerable number of agents that have so alarmed the minds of Senators, not one of them is to be appointed, by the express terms of the bill, unless it is necessary to carry out its operations; and who believes that any such number would be necessary as one in each county? If one in each county were appointed under the bill, I undertake to say that it would be a most manifest abuse of the discretion which the bill vests in the officers who are to carry it into execution.

The President further says, in his veto message:

"The subjects over which this military jurisdiction is to extend in every part of the United States include protection to 'all employes, agents, and officers of this bureau in the exercise of the duties imposed' upon them by the bill. In eleven States it is further to extend over all cases affecting freedmen and refugees discriminated against by 'local law, custom, or prejudice.' In those eleven States the bill subjects any white person who may be charged with depriving a freedman of 'any civil rights or immunities belonging to white persons' to imprisonment or fine, or both, without, however, defining the 'civil rights and immunities, which are thus to be secured to the freedmen by military law. This military jurisdiction also extends to all questions that may arise respecting contracts."

After reading that most extraordinary statement, what will be said when I show from the bill itself that so far from extending this military jurisdiction over all questions arising concerning contracts, and so far from extending military jurisdiction anywhere, it is expressly provided by the very terms of the bill that no such jurisdiction shall be exercised except where the President himself has established and is maintaining military jurisdiction, which he is now doing in eleven States, and the very moment that he ceases to maintain military jurisdiction, that very moment the military jurisdiction conferred over freedmen by this act ceases and terminates. I will read from the eighth section of the bill, which is explicit upon this point:

"The jurisdiction conferred by this and the preceding section on the officers and agents of this bureau shall cease and determine whenever the discrimination on account of which it is conferred ceases, and in no event to be exercised in any State in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has not been interrupted by the rebellion, nor in any such State after said State shall have been fully restored in all its constitutional relations to the United States, and the courts of the State and of the United States within the same are not disturbed or stopped in the peaceable course of justice."

Sir, the whole jurisdiction to try and dispose of cases by the officers and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau is expressly limited to the time when these States shall be restored to their constitutional relations and when the courts of the United States and of the States are not interrupted or interfered with in the peaceable course of justice. So far, then, from this bill establishing a military jurisdiction, it confers no jurisdiction to try cases one moment after the courts are restored and are no longer interrupted in the peaceable administration of justice. And, sir, let me ask, by what authority is it that military tribunals are sitting to-day at Alexandria, Virginia? By what authority is it that the writ of habeas corpus is suspended to-day in eleven States when the Constitution of the United States says the privilege of that writ shall not be suspended except when in cases of rebellion and invasion the public safety may require it. By what authority does the President of the United States object to the exercise of military jurisdiction by that part of the Army charged with the execution of the provisions of the Freedmen's Bureau when he exercises that military jurisdiction himself by other portions of the Army? It is not long since a military commission in the State of Georgia, without presentment or indictment of a grand jury, tried and convicted white men for the murder of a negro, and, as I understand, by the fiat of Andrew Johnson himself and by the judgment of this military commission, the men were executed for the murder. Not long ago Benjamin W. Ivey, of Robeson county, North Carolina, without presentment or indictment of a jury, was tried by a military commission (ordered by Major General Ruger) upon a charge of willfully and maliciously shooting a negro, was found guilty, and sentenced to ten years' hard labor in the State prison at Auburn, New York, and from the decision of this arbitrary tribunal no appeal was allowed. It is but a few days since a military commission was sitting in Alexandria trying persons charged with crimes; and they are held all over the South. And yet that part of the Army connected with the Freedmen's Bureau cannot exercise any such authority because it is unconstitutional! Unconstitutional to do by virtue of a law of Congress what is done without any law!

Sir, let me read what is being done in these southern States at this very time:

[General Orders, No. 3.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, January 12, 1866.

To protect persons against improper civil suits and penalties in late rebellious States:

Military division and department commanders, whose commands embrace or are composed of any of the late rebellious States, and who have not already done so, will at once issue and enforce orders protecting from prosecution or suits in the State or municipal courts of such State, all officers and soldiers of the armies of the United States, and all persons thereto attached, or in anywise thereto belonging, subject to military authority, charged with offenses for acts done in their military capacity or pursuant to orders from proper military authority; and to protect from suit or prosecution all loyal citizens or persons charged with offenses done against the rebel forces, directly or indirectly, during the existence of the rebellion; and all persons, their agents, or employees, charged with the occupancy of abandoned land or plantations, or the possession or custody of any kind of property whatever, who occupied, used, possessed, or controlled the same pursuant to the order of the President or any of the civil or military departments of the Government, and to protect them from any penalties or damages that may have been or may be pronounced or adjudged in said courts in any of such cases; and also protecting colored persons from persecutions in any of said States charged with offenses for which white persons are not prosecuted or punished in the same manner and degree.

By command of Lieutenant General Grant:

J. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

There is an order issued necessarily under the authority of the President, who is Commander-in-Chief, directing department commanders everywhere to protect loyal citizens against prosecutions by rebels for acts done in support of the Government, and to protect colored persons charged with offenses for which white persons are not punished in the same manner and degree. Where is the authority to issue that order, dated on the 12th day of January last? Sir, I want to know, if there was authority to issue such an order as that which is to-day being executed all through the South, whether it is possible that Congress has no authority to transfer that jurisdiction from department commanders to the commander of the Freedmen's Bureau, who is as much an officer of the Army as is Lieutenant General Grant himself?

But where does the Executive get the power? The President is but the Commander-in-Chief of the armies, made so by the Constitution; but he cannot raise an army or a single soldier, he cannot appoint a single officer without the consent of Congress. He cannot make any rules and regulations for the government of the Army without our permission. The Constitution of the United States declares in so many words that Congress shall have power "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces" of the United States. Can it be that that department of the Government, vested in express terms by the Constitution itself with authority to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, has no authority to direct that portion of the land and naval forces employed in the Freedmen's Bureau to exercise this jurisdiction instead of department commanders? Sir, it is competent for Congress to declare that no department commanders shall exercise any such authority, it is competent for Congress to declare that a court-martial shall never sit, that a military commission shall never be held, and the President is as much bound to obey the law as the humblest citizen in the land.

Sir, I will read another order issued within a few days, dated the 17th of February, of the present year:

HEADQUARTERS ARMIES OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, February 17, 1866.

You will please send to these headquarters, as soon as practicable, and from time to time thereafter, such copies of newspapers published in your department as contain sentiments of disloyalty and hostility to the Government in any of its branches, and state whether such paper is habitual in its utterances of such sentiments. The persistent publication of articles calculated to keep up hostility of feeling between the people of the different sections of the country cannot be tolerated. This information is called for with a view to their suppression, which will be done from these headquarters only.

By command of Lieutenant General Grant:

T. S. BOWERS,
Assistant Adjutant General.

There is an order issued within a week past, the object of which is to stop the publication of newspapers containing disloyal sentiments. By what authority, if this be a time of peace, does the military make such an order? Can we not confer that power, if the military can properly exercise it at all, on another branch of the Army? It is surprising to me that persons in the daily exercise of the very powers conferred by this amendment of the Freedmen's Bureau should deny the authority of Congress to pass the act.

But, says the President,

"The trials having their origin under this bill are to take place without the intervention of a jury, and without any fixed rules of law or evidence."

Do not all military trials take place in that way? Did anybody ever hear of the presentment of a grand jury in a case where a court-martial sat for the trial of a military offense, or the trial of a person charged with any offense cognizable before it? Again he says:

"The rules on which offenses are to be heard and determined" by the numerous agents as such rules and regulations as the President, through the War Department, shall prescribe. No previous presentment is required, nor any indictment charging the commission of a crime against the laws; but the trial must proceed on charges and specifications. The punishment will be—not what the law declares, but such as a court-martial may think proper; and from these arbitrary tribunals there lies no appeal, no writ of error to any of the courts in which the Constitution of the United States vests exclusively the judicial power of the country."

True—except the bill limits the punishment to "a fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both;" and yet that is precisely what is to-day being done, and has been done for the last four years under the direct sanction of the President of the United States. This Freedmen's Bureau bill confers no authority to do this except in those regions of country where military authority prevails, where martial law is established, where persons exercising civil authority act in subordination to the military power, and where the moment they transcend the proper limits as fixed by military orders, they are liable to be arrested and punished without the intervention of a grand jury, or without the right of appeal to any of the judicial tribunals of the country. What would have been thought of an appeal from the decision of the military tribunal that sat in the city of Washington and condemned the murderers of our late President, to the judicial tribunals of the country! Where military authority bears sway, where the courts are overborne, is it not an absurdity to say that you must have a presentment of a grand jury and a trial in a court? Sir, it is an old adage, that the law never requires impossibilities. There was a time when in all these rebellious States there was not one judicial officer recognizing the authority of the Government of the United States, when there was not one single court where a grand jury could be impaneled to maintain the law and Constitution of the United States; and are we to be told, and is it to be seriously argued, that in a district of country thus situated, where courts cannot be held, where in the conflict of arms the civil tribunals are overborne and expelled, and where martial law prevails, that no person can be tried or punished for any offense by the military power, which is the only power in existence at the time?

All parts of the Constitution of the United States are to be construed together and in harmony with each other; and although the Constitution does provide, for the protection of the citizen, that he shall not be tried for a criminal offense except on the indictment or presentment of a grand jury, and that he shall be entitled to a trial before a petit jury, manifestly these clauses of the Constitution apply to a condition of things where it is possible to have a court, to have a grand jury and a petit jury impaneled, and to bring the offender to justice before the civil tribunals; and the framers of the Constitution never intended, and such is not the meaning of the instrument, that when the civil tribunals were overborne and a grand jury could not be impaneled, still you must have the presentment or indictment of a grand jury. No, sir, the same Constitution that contains these guarantees for the protection of the citizen in localities where the courts are in operation, and where they are not interrupted in the peaceable administration of justice, contains also a clause authorizing the calling out of the militia to enforce the laws of the Union and to put down insurrection and rebellion; and when this army is called forth it operates, Mr. President, not as civil tribunals through juries and courts, but it operates as armies operate. It proceeds to put down rebellion by slaying the rebel if he is found in arms, without trial in court, without impaneling juries; but, sir, it does it in the exercise of the power which is conferred upon the Army. It acts as an army and not as a court, and the Constitution authorizes it to act as an army and not as a court, and the very reason of giving this power to call forth the Army is because the courts are unable to preserve the peace and punish offenders.

The President says:

"I cannot reconcile a system of military jurisdiction of this kind with the words of the Constitution."

Sir, if I might be permitted to ask a question of the President of the United States, I would inquire, if you cannot reconcile a system of military jurisdiction of this kind with the words of the Constitution why have you been exercising it? Why have you been organizing courts-martial and military commissions all over the South, trying offenders and punishing some of them with death? Why have you authorized the present Freedmen's Bureau to hold bureau courts all through the South? This has all been done by your permission, and is being done to-day. Then, sir, if you are in the exercise of this power now, if you have been exercising it from the day you became President of the United States, how is it that you cannot reconcile a system of jurisdiction of this kind with the words of the Constitution?

Sir, does it detract from the President's authority to have the sanction of law? I want to give that sanction. I do not object to the exercise of this military authority of the President in the rebellious States. I believe it is constitutional and legitimate and necessary; but I believe Congress has authority to regulate it. I believe Congress has authority to direct that this military jurisdiction shall be exercised by that branch of the Army known as the Freedmen's Bureau, as well as by any other branch of the Army.

But the President tells us further that "the rebellion is, in fact, at an end. The measure, therefore, seems to be as inconsistent with the actual condition of the country as it is at variance with the Constitution of the United States."

Sir, in reply to that I need only ask a question which I believe I have once already asked. If the rebellion is at an end, will anybody tell me by what authority the President of the United States suspends the writ of habeas corpus in those States where it existed. The act of Congress of March, 1863, authorized the President of the United States to suspend the writ of habeas corpus during the present rebellion. He says it is at an end. By what authority, then, does he suspend the writ? The Constitution of the United States declares that the writ of habeas corpus, that great writ of right for the protection of the citizen, shall only be suspended when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety requires it. The President tells you officially that the rebellion is ended. We know there is no invasion. By what authority, then, does he declare the writ of habeas corpus suspended? Sir, the rebellion is ended, so far as the conflict of arms is concerned; but the consequences of the rebellion are not ended; peace is not restored; the safety of the citizens where the rebellion existed is not yet established, and till it is, till the courts can be reestablished, till they can administer justice peaceably, till the citizens can be protected from lawless bands, from prejudiced slaveholders, from incensed rebels, the military authority may properly be continued, and the President is authorized, in my opinion, to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. But, sir, by his own declaration let him stand or fall. If it is competent to suspend the writ, if it is competent for military tribunals to sit all through the South and entertain military jurisdiction, this bill, which does not continue military jurisdiction, does not establish military jurisdiction, but only authorizes the officers of this bureau, while military jurisdiction prevails, to take charge of that particular class of cases affecting the refugee or freedman where he is discriminated against, cannot be obnoxious to any constitutional objection.

The President further says that—

"This bill proposes to make the Freedmen's Bureau, established by the act of 1865, as one of many great and extraordinary military measures to suppress a formidable rebellion, a permanent branch of the public administration, with its powers greatly enlarged."

That is a mistake. It is not intended, I apprehend, by anybody, certainly not by me, to make it a permanent branch of the public administration: and I am quite sure that the powers of the bureau are not by the amendatory bill greatly enlarged. A careful examination of the amendment will show that it is in some respects a restriction on the powers already exercised. The President says:

"The third section of the bill authorizes a general and unlimited grant of support to the destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen, their wives and children."

Now, let us see if it does that. In the first place let us see what the original law was. The second section of the original act is in these words:

"That the Secretary of War may direct such issues of provisions, clothing, and fuel as he may deem needful for the immediate and temporary shelter and supply of destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen, and their wives and children, under such rules and regulations as he may direct."

That is the present law enacted March 3, 1865. Now, what is the third section of the bill which the President says contains such an unlimited grant of support to the destitute and suffering refugees, their wives and children? I will read that third section:

"That the Secretary of War may direct such issues of provisions, clothing, fuel, including medical stores and transportation, and afford such aid, medical or otherwise, as he may deem needful for the immediate and temporary shelter and supply of destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen, their wives and children, under such rules and regulations as he may direct: Provided, That no person shall be deemed 'destitute,' 'suffering,' or 'dependent upon the Government for support,' within the meaning of this act, who, being able to find employment, could by proper industry and exertion avoid such destitution, suffering, or dependence."

This proviso is not in the original law. That authorizes the issuing of these supplies, all except the medical supplies and the transportation, just the same as the bill which the President has vetoed. Does he object to this bill on the ground that it authorizes medical aid to be furnished the sick? Or does he object to it because of the proviso which limits its operation, and declares that nobody shall be deemed destitute and suffering under the provisions of the act who is able by proper industry and exertion to avoid such destitution? Why, sir, it is a limitation on the existing law. Does that look much like taking care of four million people—a provision that expressly limits the operation of this act to those only who cannot find employment? A statement of the fact is all that is necessary to meet this statement in the veto message.

After commenting upon the third section of the bill, which I have just read, the President says:

"Succeeding sections make provision for the rent or purchase of landed estates for freedmen, and for the erection for their benefit of suitable buildings for asylums and schools, the expenses to be defrayed from the Treasury of the whole people. The Congress of the United States has never heretofore thought itself empowered to establish asylums beyond the limits of the District of Columbia, except for the benefit of our disabled soldiers and sailors. It has never founded schools for any class of our own people; not even for the orphans of those who have fallen in defense of the Union, but has left the care of education to the much more competent and efficient control of the States, of communities, of private associations, and of individuals. It has never deemed itself authorized to expend the public money for the rent or purchase of homes for the thousands, not to say millions, of the white race who are honestly toiling from day to day for their subsistence. A system for the support of indigent persons in the United States was never contemplated by the authors of the Constitution; nor can any good reason be advanced why, as a permanent establishment, it should be founded for one class or color of our people more than another. Pending the war many refugees and freedmen received support from the Government, but it was never intended that they should thenceforth be fed, clothed, educated, and sheltered by the United States."

I have read that whole paragraph in order to do no injustice to the views of the President. The objection which the President makes is that it has never heretofore been thought that Congress was empowered to pass provisions of this character. The answer to that is this: we never before were in such a state as now; never before in the history of this Government did eleven States of the Union combine together to overthrow and destroy the Union; never before in the history of this Government have we had a four years' civil war; never before in the history of this Government have nearly four million people been emancipated from the most abject and degrading slavery ever imposed upon human beings; never before has the occasion arisen when it was necessary to provide for such large numbers of people thrown upon the bounty of the Government, unprotected and unprovided for. But, sir, wherever the necessity did exist the Government has acted. We have voted hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars, and are doing it from year to year, to take care of and provide for the destitute and suffering

Indians. We appropriated, years ago, hundreds of thousands of dollars to take care of and feed the savage African who was landed upon our coast by slavers. We provided by law that whenever savages from Africa should be brought to our shores, or whenever they should be captured on board of slavers, the President of the United States should make provision for their maintenance and support for five years on the coast of Africa. He was authorized by law to appoint agents to go to Africa to provide means to feed them, and we paid the money to do it. And yet, sir, can we not provide for those among us who have been held in bondage all their lives, who have never been permitted to earn one dollar for themselves, who, by the great constitutional amendment declaring freedom throughout the land, have been discharged from bondage to their masters who had hitherto provided for their necessities in consideration of their services? Can we not provide for these destitute persons of our own land on the same principle that we provide for the Indians, that we provide for the savage African? Sir, they cannot provide for themselves. What are they to do? In one part of his message the President says they are permitted to go where they please. I will show by and by that by local legislation this privilege is not permitted them.

But what sort of protection would that be to the negro if it were so? Here are hundreds and thousands of these poor, ignorant, degraded human beings who never went off the plantation where they were born in their lives. They do not know how to travel. They do not know where to go; they have no means to pay for subsistence by the way; they do not know whether the railroads lead; the railroads would not carry them if they did, and were able to pay. As a friend suggests, they cannot read the finger-boards by the wayside; and where are they to go, and what is to be done with them? They are to go to the same place, and the same is to be done with them that would have been done with the hundreds of natives from Africa who a few years ago were landed destitute on our coast; they are to be taken and reduced into slavery again, or they are to perish and die for want of subsistence, or somebody must temporarily look after and provide for them.

But we have never rented lands, the President says, for the white race; we have never purchased lands for them. What do we propose to do by this bill? Does this bill provide for purchasing any land? Let us see:

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall, under the direction of the President, procure in the name of the United States, by grant or purchase, such lands within the districts aforesaid as may be required for refugees and freedmen dependent on the Government for support; and he shall provide or cause to be erected suitable buildings for asylums and schools. But no such purchase shall be made, nor contract for the same entered into, nor other expenses incurred, until after appropriations shall have been provided by Congress for such purposes."

This authorizes, if the President thinks proper to direct it, the purchase or renting of lands on which to place these indigent people; but before any land can be purchased or rented, before any contract can be made on the subject, there must be an appropriation made by Congress. This bill contains no appropriation. If the President is opposed to the rent or purchase of land, and Congress passes a bill appropriating money for that purpose, let him veto it if he thinks it unconstitutional; but there is nothing unconstitutional in this bill. This bill does not purchase any land; but it prevents even a contract on the subject until another law shall be passed appropriating the money for the purpose.

But, sir, what is the objection to it if it did appropriate money? I have already undertaken to show, and I think I have shown, that it was the duty of the United States, as an independent nation, as one of the Powers of the earth, whenever there came into its possession an unprotected class of people, who must suffer and perish but for its care, to provide for and take care of them. When an army is marching through an enemy's country, and poor and destitute persons are found within its lines who must die by starvation if they are not fed from the supplies of the army, will anybody show me the constitutional provision or the act of Congress that authorizes the general commanding to feed the starving multitude from his army supplies? And has it not been done by every one of your commanders all through the South? Whenever a starving human being, man, woman, or child, no matter whether white or black, rebel or loyal, came within the lines of the Army, to perish and die unless fed from our supplies, there has never been an officer in our service, and thank God there has not been, who did not relieve the sufferer. If you want to know where the constitutional power to do this is, and where the law is, I answer, it is in that common humanity that belongs to every man fit to bear the name, and it is in that power that belongs to us as a Christian nation, carrying on war upon civilized principles.

If we had the right, then, to feed these people as we did, have we not the right to take care of them in the cheapest way we can? If, when General Sherman was passing through Georgia he found the lands abandoned; if their able-bodied owners had entered the rebel army to fight against us; if the women and children had fled and left the land a waste, and he had, as is the fact, thousands of persons hanging upon his army dependent upon him for supplies, I ask you, Mr. President, if it was believed that it would be cheaper to support these people upon these lands than to buy provisions and feed them, might he not do so? May we not resort to whatever means are most judicious to protect from starvation that multitude which common humanity requires us to feed?

Nor, sir, is it true that no provision has been made by Congress for the education of white people. We have given all through the new States one section of land in every township for the benefit of common schools. We have donated hundreds of thousands of acres of land to all the States for the establishment of colleges and seminaries of learning. How did we get this land? It was purchased by our money, and then we gave it away for purposes of education. The same right exists now to provide for these people, and it is not simply for the black people, but for the white refugees as well as the black, that this bill provides.

Again, the President says:

"The appropriations asked by the Freedmen's Bureau, as now established, for the year 1866, amount to $11,745,000. It may be safely estimated that the cost to be incurred under the pending bill will require double that amount."

How much was expended last year for the benefit of refugees and freedmen—not through the Freedmen's Bureau, but through the Army? Have you any means of knowing? The President did not tell us, but I presume that a far larger sum in proportion to the number that were thrown upon our hands was expended before the creation of the Freedmen's Bureau in feeding and taking care of refugees and freedmen than since its establishment. Since that time the authority of the Government has been extended over all the rebellious States, and we have had a larger number of refugees and freedmen to provide for, but in proportion to the number I have no doubt that the expense is less now than it was before the establishment of the bureau.

Again, the President says:

"In this connection the query presents itself whether the system proposed by the bill will not, when put into complete operation, practically transfer the entire care, support, and control of four million emancipated slaves to agents, overseers, or task-masters, who, appointed at Washington, are to be located in every county and parish throughout the United States containing freedmen and refugees."

I scarcely know how to reply to that most extravagant statement. I have already shown that it would be a great abuse of the power conferred by this bill to station an agent in every county. I have already stated that but a small proportion of the freedmen are aided by the Freedmen's Bureau. In this official document the President has sent to Congress the exaggerated statement that it is a question whether this bureau would not bring under its control the four million emancipated slaves. The census of 1860 shows that there never were four million slaves in all the United States, if you counted every man, woman, and child, and we know that the number has not increased during the war. But, sir, what will be thought when I show, as I shall directly show by official figures, that so far from providing for four million emancipated slaves, the Freedmen's Bureau never yet provided for a hundred thousand, and as restricted by the proviso to the third section of the present bill, it could never be extended under it to a larger number. Is it not most extraordinary that a bill should be retained with the veto from the President on the ground that it provides for four million people, when, restricted as it is in its operations, and having been in operation now since March last, it has never had under its control a hundred thousand? I have here an official statement from the Freedmen's Bureau, which I beg leave to read in this connection:

"The greatest number of persons to whom rations were issued, including the commissary department and bureau issues to persons without the Army, is one hundred and forty-eight thousand one hundred and twenty."

Who are they? I said there were not a hundred thousand freedmen provided for by the bureau.

"Whites, 57,369, colored, 90,607, Indians, 133. The greatest number by the bureau was 49,932 in September. The total number for December was 17,925."

That sounds a little different from four millions. Seventeen thousand and twenty-five were all that were provided for by the Freedmen's Bureau in the month of December last, the number getting less and less every month. Why? Because by the kind and judicious management of that bureau places of employment were found for these refugees and freedmen. When the freedmen were discharged from their masters' plantations they were assisted to find places of work elsewhere.

"The above figures are based on full rations. The number of persons aided by rations or parts of rations, for December, are, colored 36,016, whites 4,932." I have given you these figures hastily, from the records—will carefully review."

This communication is from Major General Howard, the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau. In the same connection I wish to read the testimony (which has been kindly furnished me) that was given before the reconstruction committee by Major General Fiske, who is commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau for the State of Tennessee—and I wish these gentlemen who are declaiming so loudly against feeding the negro to notice the statistics. The President says, in his veto message, that Congress has never thought of making these provisions for the white people. Let us see what provisions have been made for the white people. General Fiske was asked:

"Question. How large is the pecuniary support that you are obliged to extend to the freedmen in Tennessee?"

"Answer. I am not to-day issuing a single ration to freedmen in Tennessee except to about one hundred orphan children and thirty old people at Memphis, and about sixty orphan children and twenty-five old people at Nashville; that is all."

"Question. Do you issue rations to white people in Tennessee?"

"Answer. During the last year the rations issued to white people in Tennessee have been much in excess of those issued to freedmen. When I took charge of my district the Government was feeding twenty-five thousand people: in round numbers about seventeen thousand five hundred white persons and seven thousand five hundred blacks. The month preceding the establishment of the Freedmen's Bureau, for rations alone for that class of people the sum of $97,000 was paid."

"My first efforts were to reduce the number of those beneficiaries of the Government, to withhold the rations and make the people self-supporting as far as possible. And in the course of four months I reduced the monthly expenses from $97,000 to $5,000."

That is what the Freedmen's Bureau has done in the State of Tennessee by the sworn testimony of General Fiske, whose word nobody would question, delivered within a few days before the reconstruction committee of the two Houses: and this is denounced as an expensive establishment! I undertake to say that the Freedmen's Bureau has already saved this nation millions of money, and if continued, it will save it millions more. But it is not simply in money that the country is to be benefited. There are in schools seventy thousand colored children, chiefly placed there through the agency of the Freedmen's Bureau. An agency which redresses your expenses, educates colored children, and provides homes for the destitute, is now denounced as expensive and its establishment unconstitutional. General Fiske further says:

"And in the course of four months I reduced the monthly expenses from $97,000 to $5,000; saving within that time on subsistence ten times as much money as the whole Freedmen's Bureau cost in the entire district, including all salaries paid to officers and agents for the Government."

"Question. Is the military support of the Government required now in Tennessee in aid of your bureau?"

"Answer. It is."

"Question. Do you believe that the affairs of the bureau could be safely administered there without the military support of the Government?"

"Answer. I do not."

That is all I desire to read from the testimony of General Fiske in refutation of the assumption in this message that the bill is intended to provide for the education and support of four million black people, when the evidence shows that far more whites than blacks are provided for in Tennessee; that the bureau has been a means of economy to the Government, and that the expense of feeding refugees and freedmen has been reduced from $97,000 to $5,000 in one district in four months.

"In addition to the objections already stated"—says the President—

"the fifth section of this bill proposes to take away land from its former owners without any legal proceedings being first had."

I regret that a statement like that should inadvertently (for it must have been inadvertent) have found a place in this veto message. The fifth section of the bill does not propose to take away lands from anybody. I will read it, and we shall see what it is:

"That the occupants of land under Major General Sherman's special field order, dated at Savannah, January 16, 1865, are hereby confirmed in their possession."

Is not that a different thing from taking away land from anybody? Do you take a thing away from another person when you have it in your possession already? Here are certain occupants upon lands in pursuance of an order of one of the major generals of your Army, and it is proposed by an act of Congress to protect them there temporarily in that possession. Is that taking away land from somebody? I will read what the President says in reference to that section, and then I will read the whole section:

"In addition to the objections already stated, the fifth section of the bill proposes to take away land from its former owners without any legal proceedings being first had, contrary to that provision of the Constitution which declares that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." It does not appear that a part of the lands to which this section refers may not be owned by minors, or persons of unsound mind, or by those who have been faithful to all their obligations as citizens of the United States. If any portion of the land is held by such persons, it is not competent for any authority to deprive them of it. If, on the other hand, it be found that the property is liable to confiscation, even then it cannot be appropriated to public purposes until, by due process of law, it shall have been declared forfeited to the Government."

That is what the President says. Now, I will read the section itself:

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the occupants of land under Major General Sherman's special field order, dated at Savannah, January 16, 1865, are hereby confirmed in their possession for the period of three years from the date of said order, and no person shall be disturbed in or ousted from said possession during said three years, unless a settlement shall be made with said occupant, by the former owner, his heirs, or assigns, satisfactory to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau: Provided, That whenever the former owners of lands occupied under General Sherman's field order shall make application for restoration of said lands, the Commissioner is hereby authorized, upon the agreement and with the written consent of said occupants, to procure other lands for them by rent or purchase, not exceeding forty acres for each occupant, upon the terms and conditions named in section four of this act, or to set apart for them, out of the public lands assigned for that purpose in section four of this act, forty acres each, upon the same terms and conditions."

Now, it will be seen that this fifth section, so far from taking land from anybody, provides simply for protecting the occupants of the land for three years from the 16th of January, 1865, a little less than two years from this time. If the section does anything, it simply prevents the restoration of this property to its former owners within that period, except upon terms to be entered into, satisfactory to the Commissioner, between the occupant and the former owner. This is all there is of it. It is a very different thing from taking away land from its former owners. The President says that it is unconstitutional to take land from a person except by due process of law, and that this section violates that provision of the Constitution which declares that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. Now, what are the facts about these lands? General Sherman was marching with a Union army through the State of Georgia, from Atlanta to the sea-coast. When he arrived at Savannah there was following his army a large number of persons whom he had been feeding by the way, who were dependent upon him for subsistence, and he found a large tract of country entirely abandoned and waste. He issued an order authorizing and directing these followers of his army, the negroes, to settle upon these abandoned lands and guarantying to them military protection. The possession which they took was to be temporary. It is so stated in the order. Under this order some forty or fifty thousand persons settled upon these abandoned lands with the sanction of the President more than a year ago; and notwithstanding the quotation contained in the veto message of the clause of the Constitution declaring that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property except by due process of law, I insist that a major general, under the circumstances, had a perfect right to take possession of these lands and place these persons upon them. It was a right of war. I go further, and I care not whether a house in Savannah was occupied or vacant, nor whether it belonged to a loyal or disloyal man, it was entirely competent for the commander of your army who entered Savannah, whence the rebel army fled on his approach, to take possession of any property belonging to loyal or disloyal men that in his judgment the exigencies of his condition required. These persons, therefore, were rightfully placed upon this land. If General Sherman had called a court and impaneled a jury to ascertain whether he could take possession of these abandoned lands and put the followers of his camp upon them, he would have been laughed at by the civilized world. And yet we are told that this is taking property contrary to the Constitution of the United States! It has been practiced all through the war, and it is a necessity of war.

Now, sir, I insist that these persons went rightfully upon these abandoned lands; and being there they are entitled to protection for a reasonable time. The military authority is not yet withdrawn from Georgia. They are rightfully there now. The faith of this nation, through its commanding general in that department and the approbation of the late President of the United States, is committed to these people who went upon these lands, set up their little homes, put in a crop, and supported themselves and relieved the Treasury. The faith of the nation is pledged to them in writing to protect them in this possession so long as the military jurisdiction continues; and that is not yet ended: and upon every principle of equity and justice they are entitled to be protected even beyond that time on the familiar principle that where a person enters upon an estate rightfully, as these people did, and is to hold it for an uncertain period, depending, if you please, upon the life of another, he cannot be turned off the moment that other dies; but he is entitled to hold the possession until he shall have had a reasonable time to gather his crops and remove the improvements which he may have put upon the place. Whether the time fixed by this bill is a reasonable time or not may depend upon circumstances. The former owners of the lands may make arrangements with the occupants to leave at any time, and the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau is authorized to provide for them a home elsewhere. This provision of the bill is pronounced as unconstitutional, and as taking away land without due process of law. The land was taken by military authority, in the midst of war, and of course without process in any court, and rightly so.

But, says the President—

"Undoubtedly the freedmen should be protected, by the civil authorities, especially by the exercise of all the constitutional powers of the courts of the United States and of the States. He also possesses a perfect right to change his place of abode, and if, therefore, he does not find in one community or State a mode of life suited to his desires, or proper remuneration for his labor, he can move to another where that labor is more esteemed and better rewarded."

* Now, let us see how he will remove. I have in my hand a communication from Houston, Texas, dated December 15, 1865, from Colonel De Gress, addressed to Major General Howard, of the Freedmen's Bureau, which I will read:

"HOUSTON, TEXAS, December 15, 1865.

"SIR: I have the honor to respectfully report that in some portions of this State the negroes are not yet free, that the pass system is still in force, and when a freedman is found at large without a pass, he is taken up and whipped."

That is the liberty he has to go from one place to another; that is the civil protection that he has.

"That a freedman is not allowed to hire out without written permission from his former master; at least planters have held meetings and have agreed not to hire freed people without such permission. These facts are known to me from personal observation, and written statements of reliable men."

Here is a letter from Lieutenant Stuart Eldridge to Major General Howard, dated Vicksburg, Mississippi, November 28, 1865:

"I have the honor to inclose herewith for your consideration the freedmen's bill, which has just become a law in this State, and would respectfully ask your attention to the following points thereon:

"Section first prohibits the holding, leasing, or renting of real estate by freedmen."

The President says these people are to be protected by the courts and by the civil authority. This is the protection they get in Mississippi. They are prevented from holding, leasing, or renting real estate.

"Section third compels all freedmen to marry whomsoever they may now be living with, and to support the issue of what was in many cases compulsory cohabitation."

"Section fourth excludes freedmen from testifying in cases all white."

"Section five authorizes mayors and boards of police by their sole edict to prevent any freedmen from doing any independent business and to compel them to labor as employees, with no appeal from such decision."

"Section seven gives the power to any white citizen over the person of a freedman unknown to any other law, and denies the right of appeal beyond the county court."

A telegram from Colonel Samuel Thomas, assistant commissioner, dated Jackson, Mississippi, and addressed to Major General O. O. Howard, is as follows:

"The freedmen bill has become law. It does not allow freedmen to own or lease estate. Thousands of acres have been rented from owners of land by freedmen who expected that they would be allowed to cultivate land in this way. They are notified that they must give up their leases by citizens. What course must I pursue?"

To which the Commissioner replied as follows:

"While the bureau remains in Mississippi you will continue to protect the freedmen in the right to lease land. The act of the Legislature referred to in your telegram of the 27th is not yet recognized here."

Here is another letter from Colonel Thomas, dated Vicksburg, Mississippi, December 18, and addressed to General Howard:

"The organization of the militia has had about the effect upon the country that I predicted last September. Nearly all the dissatisfaction that now exists among the freedmen is caused by the abusive conduct of this militia. It has assisted to paralyze labor and add to the combination of difficulties under which the State has labored. I do not know of one instance in which it has assisted in the restoration of law and order, or that they have exercised any power unless in something which would bring on a conflict with the national troops or hang some freedman or search negro houses for arms. Only a short time ago Governor Humphreys admitted to me that two companies of the militia had sworn that in their counties no negro who did not work for his old master and no Yankee could live, that they would 'drive out the thieving Yankees and shoot the niggers.' This is an extreme case, in which the Governor revoked the commissions of the officers and disbanded the companies. I believe his Excellency is in favor of conservative measures, and that many of the militia would blush at the recital of the outrages committed by some of the members."

I have here a number of communications of a similar character, showing that by the laws in some of the southern States a pass system still exists, and that the negro really has no protection afforded him either by the civil authorities or judicial tribunals of the State. I have letters showing the same thing in the State of Maryland from persons whose character is vouched for as reliable. Under this state of things, the President tells us that the freedman should be protected "by the exercise of all the constitutional powers of the courts of the United States and of the States!" In Kentucky, Major General Palmer, in response to a request that he should recommend the restoration of the habeas corpus, declined to do so—

"For the reason that returned rebels, of whom there are twenty thousand in that State, are openly regarded and treated as patriots, whereas loyal citizens and soldiers are objects of prejudice, dislike, and often of persecution; because courts in many instances are permitted to become the instruments of the vengeance of those who are hostile to loyal men; because laws are enforced tending to embarrass the citizens formerly slave but now freemen, and that the Government is bound to protect them until they shall have the same privileges as other citizens before the law; because outrages have been committed upon negroes which have been allowed to go unpunished; in fact, no single instance has existed in which punishment has reached the aggressors, because negroes have been murdered and their murderers have escaped because of the legal incompetency of negroes to testify against them; and finally, because there are illegal combinations of men in the State got up to drive colored men out of it to prevent them finding employment, and such persons are allowed to act with impunity."

Then, sir, is there no necessity for some supervising care of these people? Are they to be coldly told that they have a perfect right to change their place of abode, when if they are caught in a strange neighborhood without a pass they are liable to be whipped; when combinations exist against them that they shall not be permitted to hire unless to their former master? Are these people, knowing nothing of geography, knowing not where to go, having never in their lives been ten miles from the place where they were born, these old women and young children, these feeble persons who are turned off because they can no longer work, to be told to go and seek employment elsewhere, and is the Government of the United States which has made them free to stand by and do nothing to save and protect them? Are they to be left to the mercy of such legislation as that of Mississippi, to such laws as exist in Texas, to such practices as are tolerated in Maryland and in Kentucky? Sir, I think some protection is necessary for them, and that was the object of this bureau. It was not intended, and such is not its effect, to interfere with the ordinary administration of justice in any State, not even during the rebellion. The moment that any State does justice and abolishes all discrimination between whites and blacks in civil rights, the judicial functions of the Freedmen's Bureau cease.

But, sir, the President most strangely of all dwells upon the unconstitutionality of this act, without ever having alluded to that provision of the Constitution which its advocates claim gives the authority to pass it. Is it not most extraordinary that the President of the United States returns a bill which has passed Congress, with his objections to it, alleging it to be unconstitutional, and makes no allusion whatever in his whole message to that provision of the Constitution which, in the opinion of its supporters, clearly gives the authority to pass it. And what is that? The second clause of the constitutional amendment, which declares that Congress shall have authority by appropriate legislation to enforce the article which declares that there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude throughout the United States. If legislation be necessary to protect the former slaves against State laws which allow them to be whipped if found away from home without a pass, has not Congress, under the second clause of the amendment, authority to provide it? What kind of freedom is that which the Constitution of the United States guarantees to a man that does not protect him from the lash if he is caught away from home without a pass? And how can we sit here and discharge the constitutional obligation that is upon us to pass the appropriate legislation to protect every man in the land in his freedom when we know such laws are being passed in the South if we do nothing to prevent their enforcement? Sir, so far from the bill being unconstitutional, I should feel that I had failed in my constitutional duty if I did not propose some measure that would protect these people in their freedom. And yet this clause of the Constitution seems to have escaped entirely the observation to the President.

I come now to the last of the objections to this bill, and I rejoice that it is the last, both because I am exhausted, and because it has been an unpleasant duty to dwell upon this veto message. The last objection which the President takes is this:

"I cannot but add another very grave objection to this bill. The Constitution imperatively declares, in connection with taxation, that each State shall have at least one Representative, and fixes the rule for the number to which, in future times, each State shall be entitled. It also provides that the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State; and adds, with peculiar force, 'that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.' The original act was necessarily passed in the absence of the States chiefly to be affected, because their people were then contumaciously engaged in the rebellion. Now the case is changed, and some, at least, of those States are attending Congress by loyal Representatives, soliciting the allowance of the constitutional right of representation."

"At present all the people of eleven States are excluded—those who were most faithful during the war not less than others."

The President objects to this bill because it was passed in the absence of representation from the rebellious States. If that objection be valid, all our legislation affecting those States is wrong, and has been wrong from the beginning. When the rebellion broke out, in the first year of the war, we passed a law for collecting a direct tax, and we assessed that tax upon all the rebellious States. According to the theory of the President that was all wrong, because taxation and representation did not go together. Those States were not represented. Then, according to his argument—I will not read all of it—we were bound to have received their Representatives, or else not legislate for and tax them. He insists they were States in the Union all the time, and according to the Constitution each State is entitled to at least one Representative.

If the argument that Congress cannot legislate for States unrepresented is good now, it was good during the conflict of arms, for none of the States whose governments were usurped are yet relieved from military control. If we have no right to legislate for those States now, we had no right to impose the direct tax on them. We had no right to pass any of our laws that affected them. We had no right to raise an army to march into the rebellious States while they were not represented in the Congress of the United States. We had no right to pass a law declaring these States in rebellion. Why? The rebels were not here to be represented in the American Senate. We had no right to pass a law authorizing the President to issue a proclamation discontinuing all intercourse with the people in those rebellious States; and why? Because they were not represented here. They are States, says the President, and each State is entitled to two Senators, and to at least one Representative. Suppose the State of South Carolina had sent to Congress during the war a Representative; had Congress nothing to do but to admit him? Must he be received because he comes from a State, and a State cannot go out of the Union? Why, sir, is anything more necessary than to state this proposition to show its absolute absurdity? I agree, sir—

Mr. COWAN. If the Senator will allow me—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) Does the Senator from Illinois yield the floor to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. TRUMBULL. If it is a simple question, I do; but if a speech, I prefer not at this hour. Mr. COWAN. I do not intend to make a speech, but I wish merely to ask, why not cite the President fairly?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I mean to do so.

Mr. COWAN. What does he say with regard to the reason why these States were not represented here during the rebellion?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will read it. I wish the country to have the full benefit of the message. Certainly the whole country will read it. I could gain nothing by suppressing any portion of it. I did read this sentence:

"The original act was necessarily passed in the absence of the States chiefly to be affected, because their people were then contumaciously engaged in the rebellion."

I read that before. Does the Senator desire me to read further?

Mr. COWAN. No, that is the sentence.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I read that before. The Senator could not have observed it. But, sir, although the States "contumaciously engaged in the rebellion," the President states also in the same connection that each State is entitled to representation, and he insists that taxation and representation go together. The rebel States are surely no more entitled to representation before they have set up governments recognized as loyal than when contumaciously engaged in the rebellion, and no such recognition has yet taken place.

I agree that they are States. I have never argued that question. I have never thought there was any great practical importance in the question about which so much has been said, whether these States were in the Union or out of the Union. My view of it is this: they are and have been in the Union for national purposes; we have a right to establish post offices there; we have a right to appoint our custom-house officers there; we have a right to establish courts there. For national purposes they are States of the Union. What is their condition for State purposes? For State purposes, as State organizations, they were at one time certainly no part of the Union. Why? Because they set up an organization hostile to the Union. Every officer in the State of South Carolina, for instance, took an oath of allegiance to a government which had been set up in opposition to the Union. Now, while occupying that condition the State could not be represented here. Because in order to be represented there must be a State organization. There was no State organization in South Carolina for three or four years—none that we recognized. The State was there for national purposes; so far as the Federal Government legislated we held it in the Union; we kept it by our laws; we kept it by our arms; but that State by its own action destroyed its State organization, through which alone it could be represented in the national councils.

Mr. COWAN. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall be through with this point in a moment, and will then give way.

Mr. COWAN. I wish to ask one question on this point.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us have the question.

Mr. COWAN. I ask by what rule the rebel is to be treated after he submits—by what law?

Mr. TRUMBULL. He is to be hung, if he is a big rebel. [Great applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the occupants of the galleries that it depends upon themselves whether they will stay here or not. Another infringement of the rule will compel the Chair to direct that the galleries be cleared. It must not be repeated.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Now, sir, in order to have representation in Congress, there must be a State Legislature. The State Legislature of South Carolina, for illustration, was a disloyal Legislature at war with the United States. It could not elect Senators. It was not a Legislature vested with any such authority. The State government was overthrown. Now, what has happened? Another State government it is said is set up. Is it the old State government? Not at all. It is not the old constitution of South Carolina which is in force, but a new one. It is not a restoration of the old State organization. It is the construction of a new State government.

Mr. CONNESS. By rebels.

Mr. TRUMBULL. My friend says by rebels. I do not say that, but I say we are to decide who it is made by. It does not necessarily follow that it is the proper State organization to elect Senators to this body. That is a question that we must judge of. It does not necessarily follow that it is a State organization that is to be recognized with all the powers of a State in this Union. That is a question we have to decide. Whether a State organization has been established in any of the rebellious States which has authority to elect Senators, is a question Congress must decide; and if decided affirmatively, then, when proper persons present themselves, they are of course to be admitted. But that is a question the President cannot determine. It is a question to be decided by the United States, by the representatives of the people in Congress assembled. I care not how these State organizations are gotten up, whether with the aid and assistance of the President, under an act of Congress, or by the people themselves, it is enough for me to know, and it is all I want to know, that an organization has been established in any of the late rebellious States, fairly representing the loyal people of the State, which organization is loyal and true to the Union, and has the disposition and ability to maintain its authority in obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and I will thank God and welcome it into full communion with other loyal States.

Who is to decide what constitutes a legitimate State government in any State was settled years ago by the Supreme Court of the United States, in a case growing out of the Dorr rebellion in Rhode Island, reported in 7 Howard, a case that has often been referred to in this Chamber. The question there was as to which of the two governments set up in the State of Rhode Island was the State government. An action was brought by a party attached to one government against a party attached to the other, and the Supreme Court decided that it was for Congress to determine what was the legitimate State government of a State.

This part of the message I am considering is, as it seems to me, somewhat foreign to the bill, unless it be intended to assume that the Congress of the United States can pass no law in reference to these rebellious States because they are not represented here. Why, sir, is the fact that we impose taxes on them to authorize them to representation? We impose taxes on the Territories. We have imposed taxes all the time upon the people of these rebellious States; and it would be strange doctrine if a man by becoming a rebel and the enemy of his country was to deprive his country of the means of taxing his property.

The President says "the bill under consideration refers to certain of the States, as though they had not been fully restored in all their constitutional relations to the United States." It does; and that seems to be a matter of surprise to the President. I should be greatly surprised to learn that certain of the States had been fully restored. I certainly was credulous enough to believe, when the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus was suspended in them, when martial law was prevailing all over them, that they were not restored to all their constitutional relations as States in the Union. But it seems that the President is surprised that that should have been assumed in this bill.

In my judgment it constitutes no sort of objection to this bill that certain States were unrepresented in Congress when it passed. They are not represented in consequence of their own fault, and for the reason that the President himself gives, because they are contumaciously engaged, if not in open war, in hostility to the Government. Some of the State organizations are controlled by men who are passing unconstitutional laws, as I have shown you to-day; by men, some of whom went from the rebel congress to the gubernatorial chairs in their States, and some from the field where they had been in hostile array against your Government. But, says the President, in this connection:

"The President of the United States stands toward the country in a somewhat different attitude from that of any member of Congress. Each member of Congress is chosen from a single district or State; the President is chosen by the people of all the States. As eleven States are not at this time represented in either branch of Congress, it would seem to be his duty, on all proper occasions, to present their just claims to Congress."

If it would not be disrespectful, I should like to inquire how many votes the President got in those eleven States. Sir, he is no more the representative of those eleven States than I am, except as he holds a higher position. I come here as a representative chosen by the State of Illinois, but I come here to legislate, not simply for the State of Illinois, but for the United States of America, and for South Carolina as well as Illinois. I deny that we are simply the representatives of the districts and States which send us here, or that we are governed by such narrow views that we cannot legislate for the whole country; and we are as much the representatives and in this particular instance received as much of the support of those eleven States as did the President himself.

Now, sir, I have gone through with this message; my comments have been made without an opportunity for preparation or much reflection. I have probably repeated much, but as I had taken an active part in urging this bill upon the consideration of the Senate before it passed, and as it was denounced as so unconstitutional, so extraordinary, and so unusual, I thought it due to myself, at least, that I should place before the Senate and the country the considerations by which I was governed in supporting the bill. The President believes it unconstitutional; I believe it constitutional. He believes that it will involve great expense; I believe it will save expense. He believes that the freedman will be protected without it; I believe he will be tyrannized over, abused, and virtually reenslaved without some legislation by the nation for his protection. He believes it unwise; I believe it to be politic. I thought, in advocating it, that I was acting in harmony with the views of the President. I regret exceedingly the antagonism which his message presents to the expressed views of Congress, not only as to the proper mode to be pursued in reference to protecting the refugees and freedmen, but as to the present condition of the rebellious States. I shall rejoice as much as any one to have those States restored in all their constitutional relations at the earliest period consistent with the safety and welfare of the whole people. I shall rejoice when those States shall abolish all civil distinction between their inhabitants on account of race or color; and when that is done one great object of the Freedmen's Bureau will have been accomplished.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Guthrie] told us he believed the same civil rights ought to be extended to all inhabitants, now that slavery is abolished. Sir, if the southern States will do that, and protect the negro and the mulatto just as well as they protect the white man, there is no necessity and no occasion for the operations of the Freedmen's Bureau. I know that the bill contained powers which could be abused in reckless hands; but I knew, also, they were to be under the President's control, who, I trusted, would not suffer them to be improperly exerted; and if not abused I thought they were salutary provisions to accomplish the object which we all had in view.

Now, sir, with these remarks, made without any unkind feeling toward the Executive, with whom I should be glad to agree, but in justification of my own position, I submit the bill, so far as I am concerned, to the decision of the Senate.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I had intended to reply at length to the argument of the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee upon the objections of the President of the United States to the bill under discussion. I am, however, perfectly willing; if the vote can be taken this evening, to waive that reply, and let the speech to which we have listened with so much pleasure go to the country along with the message, and let the people determine, as they will have to do in their primary assemblies, whether this species of legislation is to be arrested here, or whether it is to continue in full current as it has been commenced.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, I do not propose to address the Senate on this question, but I simply design to make a statement in regard to the vote which I shall give. It will be remembered that during the discussion of this bill prior to its passage by this body, I objected to a portion of it upon the ground that, in my judgment, it was unconstitutional; and having seen no cause to change my opinion in that respect, I shall feel bound to vote against the bill at this time. I beg to read a few sentences from the brief remarks which I then made. I said on that occasion:

"Mr. President, I know of scarcely a higher duty than has been imposed by the result of this war upon the Government to provide for the very contingencies embraced within the provisions of this bill; I know of no higher obligation than to make all necessary provision for the protection and the elevation of this race, for their protection in their civil rights and in the enjoyment of their proper pursuits, and for their protection in all the civil relations of life. I know of but one higher duty devolving upon the Senate, and that is the obligation to abide by the Constitution. I stand here under the obligation of an oath to support that Constitution, and having come to the conclusion, from the arguments that have been made during the progress of this discussion, that Congress has no power to grant the provisions contained within this section."

Alluding to the sixth section, then under discussion—

"I shall, since the yeas and nays have been called, be compelled to vote to strike it out."

The Senate failed to strike out that section, and the bill passed finally with that section in it. Recognizing the same obligation now which I did then, the solemn obligation of the oath under which I act, I shall be reluctantly compelled to vote against the passage of this bill now, as I was to vote against that section then. I have to make this explanation for the purpose of having it placed upon record that I vote against this bill simply because it has this sixth section in it. I do not wish it to be understood that I approve or that I disapprove of any of the positions in the veto message, whether relating to this bill or to other subjects, except that one which holds that this bill is unconstitutional because it contains within it the provisions of the sixth section. Having made these remarks, I must record my vote against the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States notwithstanding? and the question must be taken by yeas and nays by the provisions of the Constitution.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. POLAND, (when Mr. Foot's name was called.) I am desired by my colleague to state that he is confined to his room by sickness. If he were present he would vote for the bill.

The call was concluded, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stewart, Stockton, Van Winkle, and Wiley—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Foot and Wright—2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas are 30 and the nays are 18. Two thirds of the members present not having voted for the bill, it is not a law. [Great applause in portions of the galleries and hisses in other portions, the disturbance being confined to the gentlemen's galleries.] The Sergeant-at-Arms will clear the galleries and will arrest any person making a disturbance.

The Sergeant-at-Arms proceeded to execute the order of the President pro tempore, and cleared the western galleries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (H. R. No. 321) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the spread of foreign diseases among the cattle of the United States," approved December 18, 1865; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question being put, the motion was declared not to be agreed to.

Mr. RIDDLE. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CRESWELL. Will my friend from Wisconsin withdraw his motion? I desire to have a short executive session if it meet with the approval of the Senate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If it is regarded as important to have an executive session, I have no objection; and I withdraw my motion in order that the sense of the Senate may be tested on that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn can be withdrawn only by unanimous consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered upon it. No objection being made, the motion is withdrawn.

Mr. CRESWELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 20, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. BANKS. I rise to a privileged question. I move to amend the Journal. I notice that in reference to the joint resolution relating to telegraphic communication, it is stated that it was reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. That is an error. It was not submitted to that committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is what the House understood; I certainly so understood it.

Mr. BANKS. It was not so stated; and I ask to have the Journal corrected in that respect.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk entered it as coming from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the Chair so understood it. The Journal will be corrected.

DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. HOOPER. I am instructed unanimously by the Committee of Ways and Means to ask leave to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that it is inexpedient to make any change in the excised duty on distilled spirits.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I report from the joint committee of fifteen, who have leave to report at any time, the following concurrent resolution:

Concurrent resolution concerning the insurrectionary States.

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That in order to close agitation upon a question which seems likely to disturb the action of the Government, as well as to quiet the uncertainty which is agitating the minds of the people of the eleven States which have been declared to be in insurrection, no Senator or Representative shall be admitted into either branch of Congress from any of said States until Congress shall have declared such State entitled to such representation.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker—
Mr. GRIDER. Will the gentleman allow me to offer a minority report?

Mr. STEVENS. I do not see any objection to hearing it read.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask to be heard in opposition to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. I have only given way to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GRIDER.]

The Clerk commenced reading the minority report, as follows:

"The minority of the committee on reconstruction on the part of the House beg leave to report that said committee have directed an inquiry to be made as to the condition and loyalty of the State of Tennessee. There has been a large amount of evidence taken, some part of it conducing to show that at some localities occasionally there have been some irregularities and temporary disaffection; yet the main direction and weight of the testimony are ample and conclusive to show that the great body of the people in said State are not only loyal and willing, but anxious to have and maintain amicable, sincere, and patriotic relations with the General Government. Such being the state of the facts, and inasmuch as under the census of 1860 Congress passed a law which was approved in 1863, fixing the ratio and apportioning to Tennessee and all the other States representation; and inasmuch as Tennessee, disavowing insurrectionary purposes of said State, regularly elected her members and Senators to the Congress of the United States, in conformity to the laws and Constitution of the United States—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. That is no minority report on this subject.

Mr. STEVENS. It is not; and if I had known what was in it I should not have been willing to have it received.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can withdraw his consent at any time he pleases.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I raise the question of order that the reading of the report having been commenced without objection it is now too late to object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The floor is in possession of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has yielded to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. GRIDER. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to allow the resolution to be read at all events.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the paper will be read through.

Mr. STEVENS. If it will have no effect upon my right I will waive any objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not lose his right to the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection, inasmuch as it seems to be a speech of my friend.

Mr. GRIDER. Certainly, I am very much obliged to the gentleman.

The Clerk read the remainder of the report, as follows:

And said members are here asking admission, and inasmuch as the House by the Constitution is the "judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members," considering these facts and principles, we offer the following resolution, to wit:

Resolved, That the State of Tennessee is entitled to representation in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and the Representatives elected from and by said State are hereby admitted to take their seats therein upon being qualified by oath according to law.

Mr. STEVENS. Having heard that paper read, I object. Now, Mr. Speaker, having heard that speech, which is ingenious, from my friend—

Mr. GRIDER. The gentleman says that having heard the report he objects: Objects to what?

Mr. STEVENS. I was saying that, having heard a speech upon that side of the question, and not intending to make any speech upon this side, as I hope our friends all understand a question which has agitated, not this body only, but other portions of the community, I propose to ask for the question. I think I may say without impropriety that until yesterday there was an earnest investigation into the condition of Tennessee, to see whether, by act of Congress, we could admit that State to a condition of representation here, and admit its members to their seats here; but since yesterday there has arisen a state of things which the committee deem puts it out of their power to proceed further without surrendering a great principle; without the loss of all their dignity; without surrendering the rights of this body to the usurpation of another power. I call the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. [Shouts of "Order!"]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object to debate.

Mr. STEVENS. After the question is taken I will yield to any gentleman.

Mr. ROGERS. I hope this resolution will not be driven through under the gag law. [Loud shouts of "Order!"]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a point of order. [Renewed shouts of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin rises to a question of order, and will state it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I submit that the committee of fifteen have not a right to report their proceedings by piecemeal in this manner; that they should make their final report; and that the House ought not to receive a report from them until they do make a final report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The committee are authorized to report at any time, and to make such portions of their report as they please at any time.

Mr. GRIDER. I rise to a privileged question. I appeal to the courtesy of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow me to make one or two statements.

The SPEAKER. That is not a privileged question.

Mr. GRIDER. I make an appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEVENS. There are earthquakes around us, and I tremble; I dare not yield.

Mr. GRIDER. I ask to be heard on this proposition, and that it be postponed and printed. [Shouts of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is not in order.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me for a question. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. STEVENS. Not until after the vote is taken.

Mr. ROGERS. Will he not allow me to be heard? [Loud shouts of "Order!"] This is gag law. [Renewed shouts of "Order!"]

Mr. STEVENS. I ask that the resolution be again read.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of order: that this House has no constitutional power to dismember the Union, and no authority in law to destroy the rights of the States.

The SPEAKER. That is not a point of order. A point of order can only arise under parliamentary law.

Mr. FINCK. I move to lay the resolution reported by the committee upon the table, and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEVENS. The vote has not yet been taken on seconding the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table takes precedence of the demand for the previous question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays upon the motion to adjourn; and there were, upon a division—yeas 25, noes 110.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ELDRIDGE and STEVENS were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—yeas thirty-one; noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 32, nays 121, not voting 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Brooks, Chanler, Coffroth, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Hogan, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Kerr, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Neell, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, and Wright—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buck-

land, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Darling, Dawes, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eekley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Laffin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Rollins, Ross, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Smith, Spaulding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—121.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Barker, Blow, Bundy, Culum, Culver, Davis, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Harris, Hill, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Jones, Kasson, Kuykendall, Le Blond, Marshall, Miller, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Stilwell, Strouse, Robert T. Van Horn, Voorhees, and Winfield—30.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. FINCK to lay the concurrent resolution on the table; upon which motion the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. FINCK. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Friday next and upon that motion I call the yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. FINCK, and Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas thirty, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask to be excused from voting on this question.

Mr. ANCONA. And on that I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in conformity with the decisions of the Speaker during the Thirty-Seventh and Thirty-Eighth Congresses, declines to entertain a motion to excuse a member from voting on motions to adjourn or to adjourn over. The ground for that decision is very evident; for by calling the yeas and nays on such motions it might be in the power of one fifth of the members present to prevent a majority of the House from ever adjourning, or at least delay the adjournment for an unreasonable period.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to entertain the appeal, on the same ground that he refuses to entertain the motion to be excused from voting. Gentlemen will find precedents for this decision of the Chair in the proceedings of the Thirty-Seventh and Thirty-Eighth Congresses.

Mr. JOHNSON. I differ—

[Cries of "Order!" and much confusion.]

The SPEAKER. It should always be in the power of the majority of the House to adjourn whenever they shall see fit. But if gentlemen can ask to be excused from voting on a motion to adjourn, and demand the yeas and nays upon it, or take an appeal from the decision of the Chair refusing to entertain such motion, and demand the yeas and nays on the appeal, then one fifth of the House could prevent the majority from adjourning, and this could of course be prolonged for hours.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. This is not a motion to adjourn, but a motion to fix the time to which the House will adjourn.

The SPEAKER. It is a cognate motion, equally privileged, and one that takes precedence of the motion to adjourn.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Would a motion to take a recess be in order?

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The previous question not having been seconded, the Chair is of opinion that the gentleman has a right to move a call of the House at this time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. And on that motion I call the yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, and Mr. ELDRIDGE, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask to be excused from voting on this important question of ordering a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to entertain that request during the pendency of the motion to adjourn, upon the same ground on which he has already decided not to entertain a similar request.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I appeal from that decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to entertain the appeal. He has already stated the reason. In declining to entertain an appeal under these circumstances, on account of the pendency of the motion to adjourn, the Speaker of course renders himself liable to the future censure of the House if his conduct should be disapproved; but the precedents are all in favor of the Chair's action.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 23, nays 129, not voting 81; as follows:—

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Hogan, James M. Humphrey, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Radford, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Taylor, Trimble, Voorhees, and Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Kerr, Ketcham, Laffin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercur, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Taber, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—129.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Barker, Blow, Brooks, Bundy, Culver, Davis, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Harris, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kuykendall, Le Blond, Marshall, Marvin, Miller, Pomeroy, Samuel J. Randall, Ross, Stilwell, Strouse, Francis Thomas, and Winfield—81.

So a call of the House was not ordered.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, said: I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. ALLEY, has paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. JOHNSON.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am reminded by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WASHBURN] that his colleague, Mr. ALLEY, has left the House with the understanding that he had paired with me. My recollection of the conversation between that gentleman and myself is that I declined to pair with him upon questions requiring a two-thirds vote and upon contested-election cases, but I agreed that as to all matters generally in which the "nigger" was considered to be the great point, I would pair with him. Although our agreement was not clinched by any formal contracts, Mr. ALLEY, I am informed, has gone home with the understanding I have stated; and therefore I decline to vote on this question, considering this one of the biggest "nigger" questions that could be brought up.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The question then recurred on the motion that, when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order a call of the House; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. FINCK. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. Unless the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] can point to some instance in parliamentary history in which a motion has been entertained to reconsider a vote on ordering a call of the House, the Chair must rule his motion out of order. A call of the House can always be renewed after other business has been transacted or other motions have intervened, except when a motion to adjourn is pending. But the Chair is not informed of any case in which a motion to reconsider a vote upon ordering a call of the House has ever been entertained. If the gentleman from Wisconsin can point to any parliamentary precedent in support of his motion, the Chair will be glad to be informed of it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I cannot refer the Speaker to any precedent; but I can conceive no reason why my motion cannot be entertained, as I voted with the majority of the House.

The SPEAKER. The same reason that would apply in reference to a motion to adjourn applies in this case. The gentleman certainly would not move to reconsider a vote by which the House had refused to adjourn, because the motion to adjourn could be renewed. The Chair therefore declines to entertain the gentleman's motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order a call of the House. The pending question is on the motion that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Thursday next; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there not already one privileged motion pending?

The SPEAKER. One is an amendment to the other.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GARFIELD and CHANLER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-nine, more than one fifth of those present.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 13, nays 132, not voting 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bergen, Eldridge, Goodyear, Hogan, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Sitgreaves, and Trimble—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Grinnell, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Kelso, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Laffin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercur, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Robert T. Van Horn, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Wright—132.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Barker, Blow, Bromwell, Bundy, Culver, Davis, Dawes, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Grider, Griswold, Harris, Hill, Hooper, Edwin N. Hubbard, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kasson, LeBlond, Marshall, Marvin, Miller, Noell, Phelps, Rousseau, Sawyer, Stilwell, Strouse, Taber, Voorhees, Ward, Warner, and Winfield—38.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to adjourn until Friday next.

Mr. CHANLER. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Thursday next at two o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. FINCK. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ALLISON and KERR were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-eight, more than one fifth of those present.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn over has priority of the motion to adjourn—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion; and for the information of the House will have read the decision of Speaker Linn Boyd, in 1854, which was affirmed by a large majority.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"The SPEAKER decided the motion out of order.

"Mr. ISRAEL WASHBURN, Jr., moved a call of the House.

"The SPEAKER decided the motion to be out of order, on the ground that the House have, since the demand for the previous question which is still pending, refused a call, and thereby indicated a fixed purpose to vote on the main question without a call.

"From the decision of the Chair Mr. ISRAEL WASHBURN, Jr., appealed; pending which, Mr. WHEELER moved the appeal be laid upon the table; and the question being put on the latter motion, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 118, nays 73."

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I respectfully appeal from that decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. For the reason already assigned, that such dilatory motions would prevent a majority of the House from adjourning when it desired to, the Chair cannot entertain the motion.

Mr. ROSS. Is it in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the loan bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not during the pendency of the motion to adjourn.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will it be in order to request the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his motion for the previous question for debate? If he will allow debate we will withdraw all opposition on this side and go on with the business.

Mr. STEVENS. It is simply the return of the rebels of 1861. I sat thirty-eight hours under this kind of a fight once, and I have no objection to a little of it now. I am ready to sit for forty hours.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to—

[Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn to meet on Friday next; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 24, nays 121, not voting 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Brooks, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Hogan, James M. Humphrey, Kerr, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Thornton, Trimble, Voorhees, and Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cook, Darling, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Laffin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercur, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—121.

NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Barker, Blaine, Blow, Buckland, Bundy, Conkling, Cullom, Culver, Davis, Dawes, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Farnsworth, Harris, Hill, Edwin N. Hubbell, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kaykendall, Le Blond, Marshall, Miller, Moulton, Noell, Phelps, Pike, Rollins, Rousseau, Stilwell, Strouse, Francis Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, and Winfield—38.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CHANLER. I move that when the House adjourn, it adjourns to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. FINCK. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOOPER and NIBLACK were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas thirty-one, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn to meet on Thursday next; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 18, noes 116, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Ancona, Boyer, Eldridge, Finck, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Kerr, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Trimble, and Wright—18.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CHANLER. Will it be in order now, without disturbing the motion before the House, to have a memorial read?

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I object.

Mr. CHANLER. It is an interesting memorial.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CHANLER. If it be in order to amend, I move that the House adjourn to meet on Friday next.

The SPEAKER. That motion has been decided in the negative by yeas and nays.

Mr. CHANLER. To adjourn till Thursday.

The SPEAKER. Also till Friday.

Mr. CHANLER. Would it be in order to take a recess for the purpose of allowing my friend from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] to introduce his friend, the General, upon the floor?

The SPEAKER. It would, by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEVENS. I object.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 22, nays 111, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Kerr, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Radford, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Taylor, Trimble, Voorhees, and Wright—22.

Van Horn, Warner, and Winfield—50.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred on the motion to lay the concurrent resolution upon the table.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask leave to be excused from voting upon that question as I am already paired.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for the yeas and nays on excusing the gentleman.

Mr. PLANTS. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman says that he has paired off on this question, and he is not entitled to vote upon it in that case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can, however, ask to be excused, although he has already notified the House that he did not intend to vote.

Mr. STEVENS. Let us excuse him by common consent.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is no law on the subject of pairs, and I ask to be excused from voting.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks to be excused from voting. He has already stated that he intends not to vote, being paired.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BOYER and ROLLINS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 29, noes 111.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 51, not voting 49; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Ancona, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Bidwell, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Broomall, Cobb, Coffroth, Delano, Deming, Driggs, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Grider, Grinnell, Abner C. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Wentworth, Whaley, and Wright—51.

NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Delos R. Rice, Rousseau, Spaulding, Stilwell, Strouse, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Voorhees, Ward, Warner, Welker, and Winfield—49.

So Mr. JOHNSON was excused from voting.

Mr. CHANLER. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Friday next; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CHANLER and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas twenty-five, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken and it was decided in the negative—yeas 24, nays 113, not voting 46; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Brooks, Chandler, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Aaron Harding, Kerr, Marshall, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Taylor, Trimble, and Wright—24.

Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—113.

NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Barker, Benjamin, Blow, Bromwell, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Coffroth, Culver, Davis, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Farnsworth, Goodyear, Harris, Hill, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulburd, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, McCullough, McKuer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Phelps, Pike, William H. Randall, Rousseau, Schofield, Stilwell, Strouse, Taber, Francis Thomas, Burt Van Horn, Voorhees, Warner, and Winfield—46.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CHANLER. I move that the House now adjourn, and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

INDIANA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. MARSHALL. I rise to a privileged question. On yesterday the majority of the Committee of Elections presented a report in the case of Washburn vs. Voorhees, of the State of Indiana. I was not in my seat at the time that report was made. I now ask leave to present a report from the minority of that committee, and ask that it be laid on the table, and printed.

The SPEAKER. That can be done only by unanimous consent at this time.

Mr. MARSHALL. May I ask why it cannot be received now?

The SPEAKER. A motion to adjourn is now pending.

Mr. MARSHALL. I ask unanimous consent. It will take no time.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. MARSHALL. May I ask the reason of the objection?

Mr. SPALDING. I object to any business until the subject is disposed of which we now have under consideration.

Mr. MARSHALL. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] will permit me to make a statement, I think he will withdraw his objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will not object to the report being received, but I object to any statement being made in regard to the case.

Mr. MARSHALL. I do not desire to make any statement about the case.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] will withdraw his objection, and allow the report of the minority to be received, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPALDING. Very well; I will withdraw my objection.

The report was received, laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. MARSHALL. I rise to another privileged question. On yesterday, when the election case from Pennsylvania was under consideration, I was in my seat and voted to sustain the report of the majority of the committee. I find myself reported in the Globe of this morning as not voting, and I presume the Journal is to the same effect. I desire to have my name recorded in the affirmative.

The Journal was ordered to be corrected accordingly.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the concurrent resolution reported this morning from the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House excused the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JOHNSON] from voting.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider will be entered, but it cannot be voted upon at this time. The pending question is upon the motion to adjourn, upon which the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] has demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PRICE and TAYLOR were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 23, nays 101, not voting 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Brooks, Chanler, Eldridge, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, James M. Humphrey, Kerr, Latham, Niblack, Nicholson, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Rousseau, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Taylor, and Trimble—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cook, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Driggs, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Hogan, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Ladin, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marshall, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercour, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Noell, O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rollins, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—101.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Barker, Blow, Brandegee, Buckland, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Cullom, Culver, Davis, Defrees, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Harris, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Marston, Marvin, McCullough, Miller, Paine, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, Scofield, Stilwell, Strouse, Taber, John L. Thomas, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Voorhees, Warner, Winfield, and Wright—59.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and upon that motion I call the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. That motion would be in order if the previous question were not pending.

Mr. CHANLER. I understand that the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is in order at any time.

The SPEAKER. The pendency of the previous question and a motion to lay on the table would render the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole out of order until those questions were decided.

Mr. SMITH. I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object. Let the gentleman wait till this question is settled.

Mr. SMITH. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his objection. I desire to bring before the House and the country a matter that concerns me as well as my friends.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] making a personal explanation?

Mr. BROOMALL. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The pending question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] to reconsider the vote by which the House excused the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JOHNSON] from voting.

Mr. SMITH. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL,] whether he knows anything about the subject which I desire to bring before the House.

Mr. BROOMALL. I do not; but I want to have a vote on this resolution.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, allow me to say that it is very likely, from what has taken place here, that we shall not reach a vote for an hour or two at least; and I can make in a few minutes the explanation I desire to make. The explanation ought to go before the country in conjunction with the newspaper article which I hold in my hand, and which contains a personal reflection upon me and my friends.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

The pending question being upon the motion of Mr. ELDRIDGE to reconsider the vote by which the House excused Mr. JOHNSON from voting,

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. FINCK. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that the House take a recess till half past seven o'clock.

The SPEAKER. That motion would be in order if it were to take a recess from half past four till half past seven. There is a resolution of the House that the House will take a recess daily at half past four o'clock p. m. till half past seven, unless otherwise ordered. But the House has ordered that to be suspended until otherwise ordered, and it is not now in operation.

Mr. FINCK. I rise to another privileged motion. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn till Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. CHANLER. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WILSON, of Iowa, and ROGERS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-eight, more than one fifth of those present.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 26, nays 104, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Boyer, Brooks, Chanler, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, James M. Humphrey, Kerr, Marshall, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Taylor, Trimble, and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercour, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Noell, O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Rollins, Ross, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schenck, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Taber, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Voorhees, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—104.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Barker, Blow, Buckland, Bundy, Coffroth, Conkling, Cullom, Culver, Davis, Defrees, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Dumont, Farnsworth, Grinnell, Griswold, Harris, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbard, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Latham, Le Blond, McIndoe, Miller, Myers, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Scofield, Sloan, Stilwell, Strouse, Thayer, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Welker, and Winfield—53.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. SMITH. I move that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JOHNSON] be excused from voting for the rest of the session.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain that motion.

Mr. SMITH. Why?

The SPEAKER. Because it would be too extensive.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is an appeal from that decision in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

The question recurred on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPALDING demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DEMING and BROOKS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-nine, more than one fifth of those present.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved that there be a call of the House, and demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPALDING demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHANLER. I move to be excused from voting on the pending question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPALDING demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and BOYER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-six, more than one fifth of those present.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JOHNSON] has stated that he was paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ALLEY,] and yet he has voted on ordering the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. That is a question the gentleman must decide for himself. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the legal right to vote even if he is paired; but the Chair will state that when he votes on the yeas and nays his vote offsets four who differ from him.

Mr. JOHNSON. My pair did not extend to this question. I will explain, if allowed.

Objection was made.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move to be excused from voting on this question.

The SPEAKER. For the last twelve years the decisions have been uniform with that of Speaker Linn Boyd, in the celebrated Nebraska bill contest, that a motion cannot be entertained to excuse a member on a motion to excuse.

The question was taken on the motion to excuse the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] and it was decided in the negative—yeas 10, nays 110, not voting 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Boyer, Kerr, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Radford, Rogers, Sitgreaves, and Wright—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercour, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Noell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rollins, Ross, Rousseau, Sawyer, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Taber, Taylor, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—110.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Barker, Blow, Bromwell, Bundy, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Coffroth, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Defrees, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Farnsworth, Garfield, Grinnell, Harris, Hart, Hill, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Jenckes, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kelley, Ladin, Latham, Le Blond, Longyear, Miller, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, William H. Randall, Raymond, Schenck, Scofield, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sloan, Stillwell, Strouse, Thayer, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Voorhees, Warner, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—63.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. SMITH. I rise to a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

Mr. BROOMALL. I object.

Mr. SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania why he objects to my making a personal explanation.

Mr. BROOMALL. I want a vote on the resolution.

Mr. SMITH. Let it come in as a sort of episode, as a relief. [Laughter.]

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask to be excused from voting on the pending proposition.

Mr. CHANLER. I call for the yeas and nays on excusing the gentleman.

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a privileged question. I move that the House take a recess for twenty minutes for refreshment. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. I object.

The SPEAKER. It would require unanimous consent.

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. BROOMALL. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BROOMALL, and RANDALL of Pennsylvania, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-six, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH. I rise to a question of privilege. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. A question of privilege is one affecting the rights of a member to his seat.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I notice in the Pittsburg Gazette—

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask that the gentleman shall state his question of privilege, that we may see whether it is one or not.

Mr. SMITH. If the gentleman will keep his mouth shut for a few minutes I will state it. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. I object.

Mr. ROGERS. I move to suspend the rules to enable the gentleman from Kentucky to be heard.

The SPEAKER. A motion to suspend the rules is not in order, this not being Monday.

The question was taken on excusing Mr. NIBLACK; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 16, nays 110, not voting, 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Baldwin, Boyer, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Hulburd, Kelley, Kelso, Lathin, Rollins, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Van Aernam, Elihu B. Washburne, and William B. Washburne—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brownell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Chandler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Deffrees, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hogan, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, McClure, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Taber, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Voorhees, Ward, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Wright—110.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Barker, Baxter, Blow, Brandegee, Randy, Reader W. Clarke, Conkling, Cullom, Culver, Davis, Dawes, Delano, Denison, Donnelly, Dumont, Eggleston, Eldridge, Goodyear, Grinnell, Griswold, Harris, Hill, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kasson, Le Blond, Marvin, McCullough, McKee, Miller, Niblack, Noel, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Radford, Rogers, Rousseau, Sloan, Stillwell, Strouse, Taylor, Thayer, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Winfield, and Woodbridge—57.

So the House refused to excuse Mr. NIBLACK from voting.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ANCONA said: After this vote I have agreed to pair off with Mr. ROLLINS for the remainder of to-day's session. I also ask to be excused from further attendance on the House to-day. The state of my health renders it impossible for me to remain here.

No objection was made, and leave of absence for the remainder of the day was granted to Mr. ANCONA.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded, the question recurred on Mr. ELDRIDGE's motion that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is compelled, under the decision which he had read before this afternoon, to decide that motion out of order, as the House has once refused a call of the House subsequent to the demand for the previous question, and unless the want of a quorum shall be disclosed, another motion for a call of the House is not in order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does that apply when there has been business since the last motion for a call of the House was made?

The SPEAKER. In the case which the Chair had read, Speaker Boyd decided that the motion was not in order, on the ground that the House had already decided, since the previous question was demanded, to take the vote on the main question without a call of the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. My inquiry is, if there cannot be another motion for a call of the House after business has intervened?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suppose not unless the absence of a quorum should be disclosed. When the demand for the previous question is pending, after a motion for a call of the House has once been voted down, it cannot be again received unless the fact that there is no quorum present should be disclosed, because the House has indicated its intention to vote on the main question without a call of the House. The question now recurs on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House excused the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JOHNSON] from voting upon the motion to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. STEVENS. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask to be excused from voting on that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JOHNSON] was excused from voting and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] moves to reconsider the vote by which he was excused. In accordance with the uniform usage, the Chair declines to receive a motion to excuse a member from voting on a question respecting the voting of another member. It is piling up questions one on the top of another.

Mr. SMITH. If the gentleman does not want to vote he can go in the cloak-room.

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a point of order. Mr. ROGERS is a leader of this side of the House, and we cannot excuse him. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. FINCK. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CHANLER. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Friday, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a question of order. I would inquire whether a motion to adjourn over until Friday is in order, the same motion having been already put and defeated by a vote of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that such a motion has always been regarded as in order. During the contest in the Thirty-Third Congress on the Nebraska bill, which continued for a very long time, the Speaker uniformly ruled that the minority had a right to make such motions. On the day previous to that on which the bill finally passed he made the same decision, and for the only time in the history of Congress it was reversed by a strict party vote. But the Chair rules the motion as being in order on the ground that it has been the uniform usage with that single exception. It was after a prolonged session of several days on the Nebraska bill that the Chair was finally overruled.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SCHENCK and CHANLER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 32, noes 99.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think an accommodation can be had of this difficulty if gentlemen opposite will give this side of the House two hours on this question to-morrow. [Cries of "Say one hour!" and "Order!"] Well, say one hour.

Mr. ROGERS. We will compromise on one hour. [Loud shouts of "No!" "No!" and "Order!"]

Mr. VOORHEES. I call for the reading of the resolution. Let us know what we are about.

The concurrent resolution was again read.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a question of privilege. [Loud shouts of "Order!"] We propose to settle this difficulty. [Renewed shouts of "Order!"]

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the opposite side of the House allow me to make a proposition? [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] will be heard for a moment.

Mr. WARD. I trust our friends will allow it.

Mr. PRICE, Mr. BROOMALL, and others, objected.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will they allow nobody to make a proposition to them?

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 11, nays 130, not voting 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boyer, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Kerr, Marshall, Newell, Niblack, Rogers, Shanklin, and Wright—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Bergen, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brownell, Brooks, Broomall, Chandler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Deffrees, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Lathin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClure, McKee, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Nicholson, O'Neill, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Samuel J. Rice, Ritter, Rollins, Ross, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Taber, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Voorhees, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—130.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Blow, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Culver, Davis, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Eldridge, Eliot, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hill, Edwin N. Hubbard, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kuykendall, Le Blond, Marvin, McCullough, Miller, Noel, Orth, Phelps, Radford, Stillwell, Strouse, Taylor, Robert T. Van Horn, and Winfield—42.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Pending the roll-call,

Mr. VOORHEES said: I wish to state that the President has been sustained in the Senate, and—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. FINCK that the House adjourn.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the House allow me to make a proposition?

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] will withdraw his objection.

Mr. BLAINE. Let us hear the proposition.

Mr. SPALDING. I will hear it, but reserve my right to object.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have been here in this Hall long enough to learn that there is no amusement or profit in remaining here all night. I certainly do not wish to do so, and I presume no one else does. There is nothing ever accomplished by it, except to gratify the passions and inflame the asperities of men who become excited over their favorite propositions. In this case a very important resolution has been introduced into the House by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] I have read it simply by going to the Clerk's desk and there examining it. It involves great and fundamental principles.

The proposition I have to make is simply this, and I do not make it captiously or for any partisan purpose. My proposition is that this concurrent resolution be printed and laid upon our desks by to-morrow, and that this side of the House be then allowed one hour to speak upon it if we desire to do so, and the other side take the same time if they desire, and then we will take the vote.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to that.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not think it is an unreasonable proposition.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to any further remarks. We should have had that proposition two hours ago.

The question recurred upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Upon that question I call the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GOOD-YEAR and TAYLOR were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-eight, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It is proposed on this side of the House—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 25, nays 104, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bergen, Boyer, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Hale, James M. Humphrey, Latham, Marshall, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Radford, Rogers, Rousseau, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Voorhees, and Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, Chanler, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullem, Culver, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Defrees, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hubard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Kerr, Ketcham, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Longyear, Lynch, McIndoe, McKee, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Bart Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—104.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Blow, Broomall, Bundy, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Coffroth, Cullem, Culver, Darling, Davis, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Eggleston, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hill, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hubard, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kuykendall, LeBlond, Longyear, Marston, Marvin, McCullough, McKee, Miller, Morrill, Morris, Noel, Patterson, Phelps, Plants, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Rollins, Smith, Stilwell, Strouse, Thayer, Robert T. Van Horn, Whaley, and Winfield—34.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. CHANLER. Is it in order to move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Thursday next?

The SPEAKER. That motion would be in order.

Mr. CHANLER. Then I submit that motion; and upon it I call the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONKLING. I demand tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CONKLING and BERGEN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-nine, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a question of privilege. I want to ask the other side if they will give us any time at all.

Mr. CONKLING. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. ROGERS. I want to ask—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The question was then taken upon the motion that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Thursday next; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 20, nays 110, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brooks, Chanler, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Kerr, Marshall, Niblack, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Rousseau, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Trimble, Voorhees, and Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Beaman, Bergen, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Broomall, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullem, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Defrees, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Latham, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McCullough, McKee, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Taber, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Bart Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—110.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Blow, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Coffroth, Culver, Davis, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Eggleston, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hill, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hubard, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kuykendall, LeBlond, McCullough, McKee, McKee, Miller, Newell, Noel, Phelps, Pike, Plants, William H. Randall, Raymond, Ross, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, John L. Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Whaley, and Winfield—83.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I now move that when this House adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Friday next; and on that motion I call the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONKLING. I demand tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. TAYLOR and PRICE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 29, noes 92.

So, one fifth voting in the affirmative, the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 21, nays 102, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brooks, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Aaron Harding, Hogan, James M. Humphrey, Marshall, Newell, Niblack, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Thornton, Trimble, Voorhees, and Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Broomall, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—102.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Barker, Blow, Buckland, Bundy, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Coffroth, Cullem, Culver, Darling, Davis, Defrees, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Eggleston, Goodyear, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Hill, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hubard, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kerr, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, LeBlond, Marvin, McCullough, McKee, Miller, Morrill, Morris, Noel, Patterson, Phelps, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Stilwell, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, John L. Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Stephen F. Wilson, and Winfield—60.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to reconsider the vote by which Mr. JOHNSON was excused from voting on the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved that when the House adjourns to-night, it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. BIDWELL. I rise to a point of order. We have already voted on that motion more than half a dozen times.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the gentleman so far as the fact is concerned; but the motion has been allowed to be repeated; and for this reason: on Friday the House may refuse to adjourn over to Monday, and afterward, wanting to do so, the motion can be renewed.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think we now find we can adjourn over.

Mr. MORRIS. Has the morning hour expired? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It has not commenced.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the gentleman from Kentucky be permitted to print his personal explanation.

Mr. SMITH. I wish to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania—

Mr. SPALDING. I object to debate.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPALDING demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BROOMALL and SMITH were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-one, more than one fifth of those present.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 20, nays 103, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brooks, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Hogan, Kerr, Marshall, Newell, Niblack, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Thornton, Trimble, Voorhees, and Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Broomall, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Conkling, Cook, Dawes, Dawson, Defrees, Deming, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, McCullough, McKee, McKee, Morrill, Morris, Myers, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Ross, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Taber, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Bart Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—103.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Barker, Baldwin, Barker, Blow, Boyer, Buckland, Bundy, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Cullem, Culver, Darling, Davis, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hill, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbard, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kuykendall, Latham, LeBlond, Longyear, Marston, Marvin, McCullough, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Moulton, Noel, Phelps, Pike, Price, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Warner, James F. Wilson, and Winfield—60.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think this side of the House are prepared to acknowledge sufficiently their weakness to satisfy the majority.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I object to debate.

Mr. STEVENS. Let us hear what the gentleman has to say.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope my colleague will withdraw his objection.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. MCINDOE. I renew it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I appeal to my friend to withdraw his objection. Let us hear what the gentleman from Wisconsin has to say.

Mr. MCINDOE. I insist on my objection.

Mr. ELDRIDGE (at twenty-five minutes after six o'clock p. m.) moved to adjourn.

Mr. ROGERS demanded the yeas and nays. Mr. SPALDING demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BEAMAN and THORNTON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-seven, more than one fifth of those present.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to inquire whether it would be in order to move that the House take a recess for one hour, in order that the Doorkeeper may have the Hall fitted up as a dormitory. [Laughter.] From present indications it would seem that accommodations of that sort will be necessary.

The SPEAKER. That motion would not be in order.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, but was interrupted by Mr. ELDRIDGE, who said: I wish to make a statement by unanimous consent. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

There being no objection, the further call of the roll was dispensed with.

Mr. FINCK. I withdraw the motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. STEVENS. In what condition does this leave the question?

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been demanded by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and that is the pending question.

Mr. STEVENS. Before the vote is taken I have a right to claim my hour. I will now give to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] five minutes of my time, and then I will proceed, perhaps.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I thought when I made, or proposed to make, a proposition a few minutes ago to the House, that the minority would withdraw all dilatory motions in opposition to the resolution reported from the committee of fifteen, that I would show to the majority that we were willing to yield to the superior power of numbers sufficiently even to answer the arrogant demands of the other side. The opposition which we commenced to this resolution in the morning, Mr. Speaker, was in consequence of the extraordinary provisions of the resolution and the manner in which it was presented to this House. It was in consequence, too, I may say, of the remark which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] made, that what had recently transpired, referring to the veto of the Freedmen's Bureau bill by the President, had induced the committee on reconstruction at this time to make this report. We felt upon this side of the House that such a measure, introduced under such circumstances, containing such provisions, ought to receive the most deliberate and candid consideration of the country and of this House. It was for that reason, and that the resolution might be debated, and that alone, that we made the opposition which we have during the day to immediate action upon it.

But, sir, we know our weakness and the strength and power of the numbers of the majority. We have not had the assistance which we expected from the other side of the House in our effort to obtain the privilege of debating the resolution. We know perfectly well that it has become a question of physical endurance. We know perfectly well that we cannot stand out against the overpowering majority of this House any great length of time. We know if the majority will it, the resolution will pass without debate. We have done all we could. We therefore yield to that power and throw the responsibility of this most extraordinary, this most revolutionary measure, upon the majority of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentlemen accept their condition just as Jeff. Davis did his—because they cannot help it. [Laughter.] I confess, sir, for so small a number they have made a most venomous fight. I am only sorry that the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] who belongs to the same tribe, could not have had an opportunity also to shake his rattle and point his sting.

I insist on the call for the previous question. Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield to me five minutes?

Mr. STEVENS. Excuse me.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. FINCK. I move to lay the resolution on the table; and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll on the question to lay the resolution on the table, but was interrupted by Mr. FINCK, who said: I withdraw the motion to lay on the table if the House will agree to adjourn.

Several MEMBERS. No, no; no agreement.

Mr. FINCK. Then I insist upon the motion.

The Clerk again proceeded with the calling of the roll, but was again interrupted by Mr. FINCK, who said: I withdraw my motion.

No objection being made, the motion was accordingly withdrawn, and the further calling of the roll was dispensed with.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FINCK. I withdrew the motion to lay the resolution on the table with the understanding that there should be an adjournment.

Several MEMBERS. No, no; go on.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the concurrent resolution reported from the joint committee of fifteen, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 109, nays 40, not voting 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Dawes, DeForest, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercur, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moniton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Platts, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—109.

NAYS—Messrs. Bergen, Boyer, Brooks, Chanler, Coffroth, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hogan, James M. Humphrey, Kerr, Latham, Marshall, McCullough, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Silsbees, Smith, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Voorhees, Whaley, and Wright—40.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Barker, Blow, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Harris, Hill, Edwin N. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kuykendall, Le Blond, Marvin, Miller, Noell, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Stilwell, Strouse, Francis Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, and Winfield—34.

So the resolution was agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. DONNELLY stated that Mr. AMES had paired with Mr. LE BLOND.

Mr. LAWRENCE stated that Mr. ROLLINS had paired with Mr. ANCONA.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, stated that Mr. ALLEY had paired with Mr. JOHNSON.

Mr. STEVENS stated that Mr. MILLER had paired with Mr. HARRIS.

Mr. BOYER announced that his colleague, Mr. DENISON, was still detained from the House by continued illness.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House adopted the resolution. Can I say a word without interruption? I desire to say this. In submitting the motion that I did I had intended, after the previous question was ordered, in pursuance of an understanding with the gentleman from Wisconsin

[Mr. ELDRIDGE] to move an adjournment so that we might take the vote on the resolution in the morning. Several of our friends who are absent this evening were very anxious to vote upon it. I intended, therefore, to have moved to adjourn, but a gentleman on the other side who had moved to lay the resolution on the table withdrew it in consequence of a remonstrance on our side. We were then half way through with the roll-call. I tried to get the ear of the Speaker and arrest further proceedings, and have the question go over till the morning. But so many gentlemen on this side, not understanding the arrangement that had been made, objected, as they had a right to do, that I gave up the effort. I hope the motion to reconsider will be entered that it may stand over till to-morrow morning in order that the votes of the absent gentlemen may be recorded, and then the gentlemen on the other side, if they choose to contest the matter, may try it again.

The SPEAKER. When does the gentleman wish to have it come up in the morning?

Mr. STEVENS. Immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to say one word about this matter.

Mr. STEVENS. If it is in explanation of what I have referred to, I yield.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to say simply this: that the opposition of this side of the House, by dilatory motions which have been made during the day, was withdrawn upon an understanding, intimated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and I am greatly surprised that the course which was agreed upon and understood between us was not pursued. I did not understand that that arrangement included the withdrawal permanently, but only temporarily, of the motion to lay the resolution on the table. When I found that it was so understood on the other side of the House, I instantly appealed to my friends here to withdraw the motion, and not insist upon the renewal of the motion to lay the resolution on the table. That motion was withdrawn by my friend from Ohio [Mr. FINCK] upon my personal appeal, and upon my assurance that the vote upon the resolution was by arrangement not to be taken to-night. I am greatly surprised that the vote has been taken to-night in violation, as I think, of the arrangement. I do not think, although perhaps the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is doing now all he can do in the matter, that he places this side of the House in the attitude they expected to stand, nor do I think that it is a carrying out in good faith of the arrangement which was understood by me to have been made between us. The vote upon the resolution was not to have been taken till to-morrow, and the House was to have adjourned when the previous question was seconded, as I understood the arrangement.

Mr. FINCK. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me one moment.

Mr. STEVENS. I will do so.

Mr. FINCK. I made the motion to lay the resolution on the table, and withdrew it only upon an appeal from my friends from Wisconsin and New York [Mr. ELDRIDGE and Mr. BROOKS] with the express understanding that the question was to go over till to-morrow, and that no vote was to be taken at this time. I believe it was in violation of the understanding between this side of the House and the other on this matter, that the vote was taken to-night.

Mr. SLOAN. There was no understanding among gentlemen on this side of the House that the vote was to be postponed till to-morrow.

Mr. VOORHEES. I object to any remarks by anybody except the high contracting parties. I am willing that they should have the time.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at seven o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

The following notice for leave to introduce a bill was given under the rule:

By Mr. KUYKENDALL: A bill to establish a navy-yard and depot at Mound City, in the State of Illinois.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 21, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HARRIS presented a memorial of the Bishop Gutta Percha Company, of the city of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 26) granting to the International Ocean Telegraph Company the right and privilege to establish telegraphic communication between the city of New York and the West India islands; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of an appropriation to that State to reimburse its citizens for money expended by them under the call for volunteers of December 19, 1864, and the draft resulting therefrom, and that persons held to service under that draft may be allowed the same bounty paid to volunteers under the call in pursuance of which the draft was made; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a petition of residents, freeholders, and tax-payers in the county of Washington, District of Columbia, praying that the law organizing the levy court of the District of Columbia may be so amended as to authorize the election of its members by the legal voters of the county of Washington; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Oliver Holman, late additional paymaster United States Army, praying to be relieved from responsibility for public money alleged to have been stolen from him while acting in his official capacity in Boston, Massachusetts; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the memorial of F. A. Lewis, making representations in support of a previous claim made by him for damages. The petitioner represents that the two Senators from Massachusetts, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] and the devil, have entered into a conspiracy by which he has suffered great wrong, including the loss of fifteen negroes, a large proportion of which the rebels have taken, but for which he also holds those four persons responsible. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator suggest what disposition shall be made of this petition?

Mr. ANTHONY. As a report has been made in the case, I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present joint resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, on the subject of cigars. They recite that by the act of the last Congress the excise upon cigars is levied at the uniform rate of ten dollars per thousand; that this rule compels Ohio seed leaf, worth in the market ten cents per pound, to pay a tax of four hundred and fifty percent. ad valorem, while Connecticut tobacco, the market price of which is twenty cents per pound, pays only two hundred and twenty-five percent.; and imported Havana tobacco, rated at $1 50 per pound, pays only thirty-three percent. They allege that this discrimination against the product of Ohio and other western States has cut off the demand for it, and, if continued, is likely to put a stop to the growing of tobacco in those States, and that this rule levies the heaviest per cent. of taxation on that kind of tobacco mainly used by the class least able to pay, and touches but slightly the high-priced luxury of the richer class. They therefore ask such a modification of the tax law as will make it more equitable. I move the reference of these resolutions to the Committee on Finance, and that they be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

SUFFRAGE FOR WOMEN.

Mr. HENDERSON. I present the petition of Mrs. Gerritt Smith and twenty-seven other ladies of the United States, the most of them from the State of New York, praying that the right of suffrage be granted to women. Along with the petition I received a note, stating as follows:

"I notice in the debates of to-day that Mr. YATES promises, at the 'proper time' to tell you why the women of Illinois are not permitted to vote. To give you an opportunity to press him on this point I send you a petition, signed by twenty-eight intelligent women of this State, who are native-born Americans—read, write, and pay taxes, and now claim representation! I was surprised to-day to find Mr. SUMNER presenting a petition, with an apology, from the women of the Republic. After his definition of a true republic, and his lofty peans to 'equal rights' and the ballot, one would hardly expect him to ignore the claims of fifteen million educated taxpayers, now taking their places by the side of man in art, science, literature, and government. I trust, sir, you will present this petition in a manner more creditable to yourself and respectful to those who desire to speak through you.

"Remember, the right of petition is our only right in the Government; and when three joint resolutions are before the House to introduce the word 'male' into the Federal Constitution, 'it is the proper time' for the women of the nation to be heard, Mr. SUMNER to the contrary notwithstanding."

The right of petition is a sacred right, and whatever may be thought of giving the ballot to women, the right to ask it of the Government cannot be denied them. I present this petition without any apology. Indeed, I present it with pleasure. It is respectful in its terms, and is signed by ladies occupying so high a place in the moral, social, and intellectual world, that it challenges at our hands at least a respectful consideration. The distinguished Senators from Massachusetts and from Illinois must make their own defense against the assumed inconsistency of their position. They are abundantly able to give reasons for their faith in all things; whether they can give reasons satisfactory to the ladies in this case, I do not know. The Senators may possibly argue that if women vote at all, the right should not be exercised before the age of twenty-one; that they are generally married at or before that age, and that when married, they become, or ought to become, merged in their husbands; that the act of one must be regarded as the act of the other; that the good of society demands this unity for purposes of social order; that political differences should not be permitted to disturb the peace of a relation so sacred. The honorable Senators will be able to find authority for this position, not only in the common law, approved as it is by the wisdom and experience of ages, but in the declaration of the first man, on the occasion of the first marriage, when he said, "This is now bone of my bone and flesh of my flesh."

It may be answered, however, that the wife, though one with her husband, at least constitutes his better half, and if the married man be entitled to but one vote, the unmarried man should be satisfied with less than half a vote. [Laughter.] Having some doubts, myself, whether beyond a certain age, to which I have not yet arrived, such a man should be entitled to a vote or even half a vote, I leave the difficulty to be settled by my friend from Massachusetts and the fair petitioners. The petitioners claim, that as we are proposing to enfranchise four million emancipated slaves, equal and impartial justice alike demands the suffrage for fifteen million women. At first view the proposition can scarcely be met with denial, yet reasons "thick as blackberries" and strong as truth itself may be urged in favor of the ballot in the one case, which cannot be urged in the other.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I rise to a point of order. My point of order is, that a man who has lived an old bachelor as long as the Senator from Missouri has has no right to talk about women's rights. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is not a point of order; and the Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. HENDERSON. I had no idea that that was a point of order, sir. Whatever may be said theoretically about the elective franchise as a natural right, in practice, at least, it has always been denied in the most liberal States to more than half the population. It is withheld from those whose crimes prove them devoid of respect for social order, and generally from those whose ignorance or imbecility unfits them for an intelligent appreciation of the duties of citizens and the blessings of good government. To women the suffrage has been denied in almost all Governments, not for the reasons just stated, but because it is wholly unnecessary as a means of their protection. In the government of nature the weaker animals and insects, dependent on themselves for safety and life, are provided with means of defense. The bee has its sting and the despised serpent its deadly poison. So, in the Governments of men, the weak must be provided with power to inspire fear at least into the strong, if not to command their respect.

Political power was claimed originally by the people as a means of protecting themselves against the usurpations of those in power, whose interests or caprices might lead to their oppression. Hence came the republican system. But it was never thought the interests or caprices of men could lead to a denial of the civil rights or social supremacy of woman. People of one race have always been unjust to those of another. The ignorant and sordid Jew despised the Samaritan and scoffed at the idea of his equality. To him the learned and accomplished Greek was a barbarian, and all rights were denied him except those simple rights accorded to the most degraded Gentile. Chinamen, today, believe as firmly in the superiority of the Celestial race as Americans do in the superiority of the Anglo-Saxon. All races of men are unjust to other races. They are unjust because of pride. That very pride makes them just to the women of their own race. There may be men who have prejudice against race; they are less than men who have prejudice against sex. The social position of woman in the United States is such that no civil right can be denied her. The women here have entire charge of the social and moral world. Hence she must be educated. First impressions are those which bend the mind to noble or ignoble action, and these impressions are made by mothers.

To have intelligent voters we must have intelligent mothers. To have free men we must have free women. The voter from this source receives his moral and intellectual training. Woman makes the voter, and should not descend from her lofty sphere to engage in the angry contests of her creatures. She makes statesmen, and her gentle influence, like the finger of the angel pointing the path of duty, would be lost in the controversies of political strife. She makes the soldier, infuses courage and patriotism in his youthful heart, and hovers like an invisible spirit over the field of battle, urging him on to victory or death in defense of the right. Hence woman takes no musket to the battle-field. Here, as in politics, her personal presence would detract from her power. Galileo, Newton, and La Place could not fitly discuss the laws of planetary motion with ignorant rustics at a country inn. The learned divine who descends from the theological seminary to wrangle upon doctrinal points with the illiterate, stubborn teacher of a small country flock must lose half his influence for good. Our Government is built as our Capitol is built. The strong and brawny arms of men, like granite blocks, support its arches; but woman, lovely woman, the true goddess of Liberty, crowns its dome.

Mr. YATES. I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri a question. I understand that he has introduced a resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States so that there shall be no distinction on account of color. Will the gentleman accept an amendment to that resolution that there shall be no distinction in regard to sex?

Mr. HENDERSON. I have given my views, I think, very distinctly, as the Senator would have found if he had listened, in the latter part of what I have just stated in reference to the question of voting. In reply to what he has said, I will say that I do not think that on the mere presentation of a petition it is in order to discuss the merits of the petition. I hope, therefore, that the Senator will not insist upon entering into a question of that sort now.

Mr. YATES. I shall not do so. I only wish to say that I am not proposing to amend the Constitution. I simply desire to give rights to those who have rights under the Constitution as it has been amended. When I propose to amend the Constitution then the question will come up whether I will allow women to vote or not.

Mr. SUMNER. Before this petition passes out of sight I wish to make one observation, and only one. The Senator from Missouri began by an allusion to myself and to a remark which fell from me when I presented the other day a petition from women of the United States praying for the ballot. I took occasion then to remark that in my opinion the petition at that time was not judicious. That was all that I said. I did not undertake to express any opinion on the great question whether women should vote or should not vote. I did venture to say that in my opinion it was not judicious for them at this moment to bring forward their claims so as to compromise in any way the great question of equal rights for an enfranchised race now before Congress.

The Senator has quoted a letter suggesting that I did not present the petition in a creditable way. I have now to felicitate my excellent friend on the creditable way in which he has performed his duty. [Laughter.]

Mr. YATES. Allow me to say that I think the two gentlemen, one of whom has arrived at the age of forty-nine and the other sixty-three, have no right to discuss the question of women's rights in the Senate. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Missouri suggest the disposition he wishes made of this petition?

Mr. HENDERSON. Let it lie on the table. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of James Dale Johnston, a naturalized citizen of the United States, praying to be protected against any claim which may be preferred against him as a former subject of Great Britain, he having, as is alleged, voluntarily transferred his allegiance to the United States; and also praying that Charles Underwood O'Connell, recently tried in Ireland for a connection with the Fenian Brotherhood, may be demanded of the Government of Great Britain to be surrendered to the Government of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The same committee, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of Newbern, North Carolina, praying to be relieved from the payment of retrospective taxes claimed to be due under and by virtue of an ordinance of the convention of North Carolina ratified on the 18th of October, 1865, have instructed me to report it back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration, upon the ground that in the opinion of the committee no legislation can properly be had on the subject. If the parties have a remedy, they must find it in the courts and not in legislation by Congress.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of George Warren, Daniel Hood, and C. R. Humphrey, praying for compensation for the ship State of Maine, seized by the rebel authorities on the 24th of May, 1861, and burnt by them, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORTON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Kate Pettit, praying for relief for injuries alleged to have been received by her through the carelessness of the driver of a Government team, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 102) to incorporate the National Mutual Protection Homestead Company, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1) extending the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 218) for the relief of Charles Youly, reported it without amendment.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, it was Ordered, That Joseph O'Neal have leave to withdraw his petition and other papers from the files of the Senate.

REPRESENTATION OF SOUTHERN STATES.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk:

Mr. President, the House of Representatives have passed a concurrent resolution, in which I am directed to ask the concurrence of the Senate, declaring that no Senator or Representative shall be admitted into either branch of Congress from any of the eleven States which have been declared to be in insurrection until Congress shall have declared such State entitled to such representation.

INTER-CONTINENTAL TELEGRAPH.

Mr. SUMNER. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the House joint resolution No. 75, to encourage and facilitate telegraphic communication between the western and eastern continents, have had the same under consideration and directed me to report it back with certain slight amendments. It is important that the resolution should be acted upon promptly, and as the amendments are very slight, and the whole case can be easily explained, I ask the indulgence of the Senate to act upon it now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 75) to encourage and facilitate telegraphic communication between the western and eastern continents.

The preamble recites that, by an act entitled "An act to encourage and facilitate telegraphic communication between the eastern and western continents," approved July 1, 1864, the Secretary of the Navy was authorized to detail a vessel to assist in surveys and soundings, laying down submarine cable, transporting materials connected therewith, and generally to afford such assistance as might be deemed best calculated to secure a successful promotion of the enterprise; and that the Emperor of Russia, for the purpose of coöperating with the Government of the United States, under the act aforesaid, has ordered a steam corvette, the Variay, of two thousand one hundred and fifty-six tons burden, seventeen guns, three hundred and six men, to assist in the achievement of the telegraph, and has placed that steamer subject to the orders of the telegraph company; and that the company intend, during the ensuing summer, to lay the submarine cable required at Behring's strait, the cable and the material for the entire line being now in transit, and the vessels of the company, seven in number, being ready at San Francisco and Vancouver for the expedition, and require immediate coöperation on the part of the United States, in conformity with the act. The resolution, therefore, proposes to authorize and require the Secretary of the Navy to detail one steam vessel from the squadron of the Pacific station, or elsewhere, to assist in making surveys and soundings in that part of the Pacific coast, both of America and Asia, where it is proposed to establish the telegraph, in laying the submerged cable, in transporting materials connected therewith, and generally to afford such assistance as may be best calculated to secure the success of the enterprise, and to carry out the purposes of the act approved July 1, 1864, entitled "An act to encourage and facilitate telegraphic communication between the eastern and western continents."

The first amendment was to strike out in lines eight and nine of the resolution the words "in transporting materials connected therewith."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was at the end of the joint resolution to add:

So far as the same can be afforded without dismantling her, or destroying her, or impairing her efficiency as a vessel of war.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts what reason is given by the Secretary of the Navy for not having furnished a vessel before under the original law. This simply makes imperative what was formerly discretionary, as I understand.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator understands that when that act was passed we were engaged in suppressing the rebellion; our ships were employed in a very extensive blockade, and the Secretary of the Navy had not, as I understand, a proper vessel which he was disposed to send off on this distant service. There was a hitch of some kind there; and the object of this resolution is to get over that and to assure the participation of the United States in this very important enterprise. Already, I understand, ships are assembled at San Francisco in order to embark in the laying down of the cable. Russian ships are there, and there are also American ships ready to participate. It is desirable that the flag of the United States should be in this work side by side with the flag of Russia. However, I will not say anything more about it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There was a vessel furnished by the Treasury Department at the time. The Navy Department had no vessel, to be sure, that it could furnish, and an application was made for the use of one of the revenue boats, and an arrangement was made between the Treasury and Navy Departments by which a revenue boat was furnished for this purpose and put into the possession of the persons managing this expedition, and the Navy Department, on its part, performed some duties on the coast of California in relation to the revenue. Perhaps the Senator from California can tell more about it than I can. I know, however, having been Secretary of the Treasury at the time, that that arrangement was made and went into execution, and a vessel was furnished under the act, and has been in the service of this company for the purposes named in the original act, and used by them. Now, this resolution must be something further than merely to make up a defect that occurred at that time, and I should like to be furnished with information on that subject before acting upon a resolution of this description.

Mr. CONNESS. The honorable Senator from Maine is right in saying that some service was performed in behalf of this company by the Government under the arrangement to which he refers, but it was of rather a temporary or preliminary character.

It will be remembered that a discretion was given by the original law passed in 1864 to the Secretary of the Navy to furnish a ship, but, as stated by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, our national ships were then fully engaged, and the Pacific squadron at that time was so reduced that no vessel of any considerable proportions could be spared. The brig Fauntleroy, an old vessel connected with the coast survey, was at first set apart by the Navy Department for that service; but considering the latitude in which the services were required to be performed, and the condition of that vessel, it was concluded that she was entirely unfitted to perform any service whatever.

Then the Navy Department and the Treasury Department made an arrangement by which the small revenue cutter Shubrick was transferred to this company for the purpose of a preliminary survey of a part of the route; and in the mean time naval ships in the port of San Francisco were transferred temporarily to the revenue department of the Treasury for revenue service. But the Shubrick is a steam revenue cutter of the smallest class; the service that she performed was of a very temporary and preliminary character, as I have said. It is now asked by this company, and I think with great propriety, that a national vessel shall be furnished, in accordance with the discretion originally conferred upon the Navy Department. I will say here, for the information of the Senator from Ohio, that the Secretary of the Navy did not feel that the law was sufficiently mandatory upon him to order one of the leading ships of the Pacific squadron into this service; and he seeks that this authority shall be given and made mandatory upon him, so that he will, in doing it, be performing his duty under provisions of law rather than doing an act discretionary with him which involves the Government in some expenditure of public moneys. He is not averse, and the Navy Department never have been, to facilitating the purposes of this company, but, on the contrary, are in favor of doing it, and wish the authority of Congress to engage in the performance of this service.

Then the statement made by the honorable Senator from Maine is correct, as I have stated, in detail; and it is now further necessary that a ship of the Government shall be placed along side of a vessel-of-war furnished by the Russian Government, as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, to engage in the completion of the surveys. The company have so advanced and progressed with all their movements as to make this the opportune time for seeking this additional aid from the Government; and under the restriction proposed in the joint resolution, I think it should be given, and hope that the resolution will pass as amended.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My recollection of the original act—I may be wrong about it, but I should like to have it read—is that a vessel was to be furnished for taking out certain materials to be used by this company. That was all the duty which was imposed upon the Navy Department to furnish a vessel for the purpose of doing certain things. They had no vessel; and then, by this arrangement, a vessel was furnished by the Treasury Department to do all that the original act provided should be done by the Navy Department. I understood that the vessel was sufficient and satisfactory to the company. If that be so, this resolution proposes something more. I think it would be well for the Senate to hear the original act read, and then see whether this does not go further. I do not say that I have any objection to this, but I really think that instead of being a joint resolution to carry out the original act, it is a joint resolution to do something more than was intended to be done by the Government under the terms of the original law. If the Senator from California has the original law with him I should like to have it read that we may see what it is.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is there any appropriation in this resolution?

Mr. CONNESS. There is not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It takes money from the Navy Department, of course, for the vessel.

Mr. ANTHONY. The last bill authorized but did not instruct the Secretary of the Navy to furnish a vessel, but it provided no money. He found that it would cost some two or three hundred thousand dollars. He did not wish to incur that expense and have it charged to the general cost of the Navy without the direct approval of Congress.

Mr. SUMNER. I have here the act of 1864. It is entitled "An act to encourage and facilitate telegraphic communication between the eastern and western continents," in five sections. The first section is, that Perry McDonough Collins and his associates and assignees may construct lines of telegraph through the Territories of the United States to the boundaries of British America, &c. The second section is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That in order to encourage and aid the construction of said line of telegraph beyond the limits of the United States, the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to detail for the use of the surveys and soundings, along that portion of the Pacific coast, both of America and Asia, where it is proposed to establish said telegraph, one steam or sailing vessel, in his discretion, to assist in surveys and soundings, laying down submerged cable, and in transporting materials connected therewith, and generally afford such assistance as may be deemed best calculated to secure a successful promotion of the enterprise."

This act bears date July 1, 1864. I understand that in point of fact the Russian Government have sent one of their own vessels in order to meet the vessel assigned under this act and cooperate with it.

Mr. CONNESS. With the permission of the Senator, I will state that I hold in my hand a copy of the official letter of the Russian Minister of Marine giving the Russian vessel, and I send it to the desk to be read if there be no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. Before that is read, let me finish what I was going to say. I understand that the Russian Government, becoming aware of this statute, have sent a ship to cooperate in this great work, but on arriving at San Francisco there is no American ship to cooperate with them; they are alone, though they have come into this enterprise on the invitation of this act of Congress. Now, the resolution before the Senate is to require the Secretary of the Navy to send one of our national ships there to meet this Russian ship, which is already at its post of duty, where it has gone, as the Russian Government supposed, in pursuance of this act of Congress. It seems to me that in a certain sense—I do not like to use too strong an expression, but I was going to say the faith of our Government or its honor is pledged to see that we have a national ship to meet the Russian ship which has come there practically on our invitation.

Mr. CONNESS. Now let the letter be read. The Secretary reads, as follows:

St. Petersburg, November 27, 1865.

To Major P. McD. COLLINS:

MY DEAR SIR: The request of the American Union Telegraph Company, soliciting as a new grant the cooperation of one of the vessels of the imperial navy in the surveys to be done along the Russian territories, addressed to his imperial Highness the Grand Duke Constantine, was forwarded for my approval, and desiring to assist your company by all the means in my power, I gave my immediate consent.

I have now the pleasure to inform you that his imperial Majesty the Emperor, has been graciously pleased to give the order appointing one of the ships now on the Pacific station, the screw corvette Variag, to assist your company in the works for the construction of the telegraph line that is to unite America with Europe.

This particular favor is a new proof of the interest the imperial Government takes in the construction of this important telegraph line, and of the desire to facilitate as much as possible this great undertaking, in order to assist in carrying it to a speedy conclusion.

Wishing very naturally to know as much as possible about the proceedings of the works, I profit of this occasion to repeat my request of sending me all the details and intelligence concerning this interesting subject.

Believe me, yours truly, I. TOLSTOY.

MINISTER OF IMPERIAL POSTS AND TELEGRAPHS.

The screw corvette Variag is two thousand one hundred and fifty-five tons burden, three hundred-and-sixty-horse-power engines, seven-teen guns, and three hundred and six men.

Mr. GRIMES. I think there is no very valid objection to this resolution as amended by the Committee on Foreign Relations and reported by them to the Senate. If it shall be enacted into a law, Congress will substantially agree to do on the part of the United States what the Russian Government has agreed to do. It will be observed by the letter which has just been read, that the telegraph company applied to the Russian Government for a vessel-of-war to as-ist in the surveys along the coast of Russia. As amended by the Committee on Foreign Relations, the vessel-of-war that will be detailed for this specific purpose will be authorized to make soundings and surveys between the Russian coast and the American coast, and to render any other assistance that it may be compatible for a vessel-of-war to render, provided such assistance shall not require her to be dismantled or her efficiency as a vessel-of-war to be destroyed or impaired. It is very proper, I think, that this Government, even if this telegraph company was not in question, should make surveys of that coast and of Behring's straits, and of the sea where it is said this telegraph cable was to be laid. I understand we have one hundred and sixty vessels that annually pass through Behring's straits; and I had intended during this session to introduce a bill providing for the Government taking up the surveys that were commenced some years ago by Commodore Ringgold and Commodore Rodgers, and carrying them forward. This resolution, if it passes, will be rather in anticipation of that which I think the Government ought to do. As it has been amended, I think there can be no particular objection to the resolution.

In regard to the bill which was passed two years ago, I will say that the great objection, and an objection which at the time I knew must be raised to it, was that there was no appropriation accompanying it. It authorized a vessel-of-war to be dispatched for a specific purpose without any appropriation accompanying the grant of that authority, and therefore there was no power in the Secretary of the Navy to carry it into execution; and that I suppose was one of the reasons why the Secretary of the Navy entered into an agreement with the Secretary of the Treasury by which a Treasury vessel was dispatched in that direction and a naval vessel performed Treasury duties on the coast of California.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read the third time. The resolution was read the third time, and passed.

A subsequent message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendments of the Senate; and also that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 75) to encourage and facilitate telegraphic communication between the western and eastern continents; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 321) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the spread of foreign diseases among the cattle of the United States," approved December 18, 1865, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill continuing in force until repealed by Congress the present Freedmen's Bureau bill.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WADE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 159) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Guardian Society and provide for reforming juvenile offenders in the District of Columbia," and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 34) expressive of the gratitude of the nation to the officers, soldiers, and seamen of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENCY OF MEXICAN REPUBLIC.

Mr. McDUGALL submitted the following resolution, and asked for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if in his judgment not inconsistent with the public interest, any correspondence or other information in possession of the Government with regard to the term of office of President Benito Juarez, of the republic of Mexico, and as to the period when, under the constitution, a popular election in that country should take place, and of any vote of confidence and extraordinary power given to him by the Congress of Mexico.

Mr. WILSON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution lies over under the rule.

ADJOURNMENT TO FRIDAY.

Mr. WADE. I understand that to-morrow an oration is to be delivered by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GRESWELL,] on the lamented death of our friend, that noble patriot, Henry Winter Davis; and as I presume that many of the Senators would like to attend it, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

The motion was agreed to.

REPRESENTATION OF SOUTHERN STATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the consideration of the special order be postponed. My object in doing so is that we may take up and proceed with the consideration of the concurrent resolution which has come to us from the House of Representatives this morning.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Is it not necessary under the rules that that resolution should be referred to a committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Maine is that the special order, which is House joint resolution No. 51, and all prior orders be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution just received from the House of Representatives. That motion is in order.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether the resolution from the House of Representatives does not, under the rules, require a reference to a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not require a reference. It is competent for the Senate to act upon it without a reference, if they shall so determine.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to state, what may have escaped the recollection of my friend from Maine, that the Senator from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor on the joint resolution which is the special order, and expected to address the Senate, and therefore I think it would be better to allow him now to address the Senate on that subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He will retain the floor whenever its consideration is resumed.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I wish to say that I do not ask that the special order be proceeded with at this time on my account. I hope members will not vote on the question with reference to any idea of that description. I called for the yeas and nays simply because I was opposed to proceeding with the consideration of the House resolution. As to the other question of my having the floor upon a prior measure, I am quite indifferent whether gentlemen vote with reference to that fact or not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will retain the floor and will be entitled to it whenever that matter comes up again.

Mr. BUCKALEW. My speech has been coked up so long that I have lost to a great extent the interest which I felt in the matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. My vote on this motion will be controlled entirely by the wishes of the Senator from Pennsylvania. If having the floor he has made preparation to speak to-day, I would not deprive him of that right, although

I think it would be better to take up the House resolution and dispose of it. I suggest, therefore, that the Senator from Maine had better allow the Senator from Pennsylvania to make his speech, and then when that is over, his motion will be in order. I wish to know from the Senator from Pennsylvania definitely whether he desires to speak this morning or not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Pennsylvania, as I understand him, has already stated that it is a matter of indifference to him whether he speaks to-day or at another time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like him to state distinctly what his preference is.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have said that I am entirely indifferent on that point.

Mr. DIXON. I rise to a question of order. I desire to inquire whether under the 26th rule this resolution must not lie on the table one day for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order, in the opinion of the Chair, to proceed to the consideration of the resolution. It can, however, receive but one reading to-day unless by the common consent of the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to ask of the Chair whether a concurrent resolution need be read more than once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not yet advised what the character of the resolution is; he has not heard it.

Mr. COWAN. I suggest that the resolution be read. I do not know for my part what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Concurrent resolution concerning the insurrectionary States.

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That in order to close agitation upon a question which seems likely to disturb the action of the Government, as well as to quiet the uncertainty which is agitating the minds of the people of the eleven States which have been declared to be in insurrection, no Senator or Representative shall be admitted into either branch of Congress from any of said States until Congress shall have declared such State entitled to such representation.

Mr. COWAN. From the importance of that resolution I think it had better go over and be printed that we may have time to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that the resolution is not yet before the Senate. It has been read for information. The motion is that the Senate now proceed to its consideration.

Mr. COWAN. That is subject to debate, I presume.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so— not to debate the merits, however, of the resolution, but to state reasons why, or why not, the Senate should now proceed to its consideration.

Mr. COWAN. I am not so certain but that that is the most important resolution that has ever been offered in this body. I cannot conceive, myself, of anything of more moment than that we should decide upon the spur of the instant that eleven sovereign States of the Union shall be shut out from this body, without debate and without consideration. It may be that Senators have made up their minds to do this; it may be that it has been predetermined; but certainly I think no man who desires the continuance of this Union, no man who holds that this Union depends on the common consent of all its parts, and that it depends, further, upon a yielding by the remote parts of their particular desires and partialities to a certain extent in order to maintain that Union, can contemplate the proposition without apprehension.

Mr. President, after the struggles we have made for the Union, after the sacrifices we have made for it, after the dead have been buried, after the cost has been counted up, are we to determine here solemnly, as the Chicago convention determined, that the war was a failure and the Union cannot be restored?

I think that a question of such moment at least deserves the careful, cool, deliberate, calm, dispassionate consideration of this body. Senators will remember how many people have stakes in this resolution, how many people in this country, how many people in all countries, what the hazard may be in suddenly coming to a determination of this kind. I appeal to my friend from Maine. I think he certainly would not desire a resolution of this kind to pass without at least that deliberation which becomes wise and prudent and careful men invested here with a high and solemn trust. I think no man will desire that this resolution be passed through this body suddenly, in haste, in heat, or without that careful consideration which the magnitude of the subject deserves; and I would therefore beg that it may go over for this time, and let us read it, think of it, consider it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. One would imagine, Mr. President, that the importance of this question, and attachment to the Union, and the proper consideration of all matters relating thereto, were exclusively confined to the breast of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, from the solemnity of his tone and the manner in which he addresses the Senate on that subject. One would naturally presume that the great majority of the Senate, composing, as it was supposed a day or two ago, something over two thirds of the body, had really a little attachment to the Union of the States, and a little power of considering what was best for the United States of America in the premises, and a reasonable degree of patriotism which should lead them to consider all these questions with care and with all that deliberation which belongs to them. Sir, we do not need the warning of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania. I do not need it for myself, and I am not very much disposed to regard it.

The question which is submitted in the resolution that comes from the House is a very simple one. It is a question whether Congress has any power in relation to the great questions of reconstruction and the restoration of the Union to its former condition; whether it has any power except simply to judge whether a man who presents himself here with credentials from any portion of the country comes in due form, or whether the Congress of the United States, Senators elected by the States and Representatives elected by the people of the States, have or have not something to do with the organization of this Government in its former shape; whether they are anything more than mere tools and instruments to look at papers and decide whether they are in due form, or whether they have a right to bring their deliberate judgment to the consideration of the great questions before the American people.

Now, sir, all these questions should be considered deliberately, with conscientiousness, and with all the care that is necessary in order to understand them and to decide them well. I agree perfectly with the gentleman that all the time necessary for that purpose should be given. The rules of this body are such that all that time must necessarily be given. Every member of this body may speak ad libitum, in season and out of season, in breath and out of breath, in ideas or out of ideas, as we have sometimes witnessed speeches in this body to be. The rules allow all that. We cannot control the rules, and it has never happened in my day that a question of importance could pass or did pass from the consideration of the Senate until it had been thoroughly and ably and well discussed.

Now, sir, that was, if the honorable Senator will allow me to say so, all pretense. He has no fears of this resolution being passed without due consideration. The question is as to the time of bringing it before the body—the time we shall proceed to its consideration. That is all, and in my judgment—I speak only for myself, and the Senate will overrule me if it comes to a different conclusion—there is no time so proper as now to take up precisely that question, and ascertain before we go any further in the consideration of these great questions whether or not we have any power over the subject at all. We have done hardly anything from the beginning of this session but to debate this very question one way and another. Gentlemen of all shades of opinion have debated it, some contending that the States that once called themselves the confederate States were not States in the Union; others contending that they were States for some purposes and not for others, and each one having his own notion. We have had acres of discussion, if I may be allowed to use that expression, though it is not very appropriate, upon those very questions, and it is hardly to be supposed that there is a gentleman here who has not his opinions upon them. I have mine; I have not taken occasion to express them; I may. If I should have strength enough to do it, I will.

But, sir, what I wish now, and what I insist upon, is that at the very earliest moment the Senate proceed to the consideration of this question, which lies at the foundation of all others. If we have the right to consider and discuss this question, if we have the right to do anything besides looking at credentials that come here to the Senate and to the House of Representatives and to see whether they are in due form, it is time that we should know it. If we have not that right it is time we should abandon all pretense of it and proceed to be the mere nobodies (when the great interests of this country are concerned) that we might be made, and that we shall be made unless we assert our own proper rights and our own proper dignity as the Congress of the nation, to look at these great questions arising at this time and pressing upon us as they are, as men who have something to do with the preservation of the character and the institutions of the country. That, sir, is the reason why I am unwilling to proceed with any other question until this is well considered.

I do not know what the rules of the Senate may be. If they require that the resolution shall go over for one day, let us take it up and then let it go over. But I wish to know of this Senate whether we are or are not to proceed at the earliest possible moment to settle this question that lies at the foundation of all others which we are now considering, and which are of so much importance to the country; and whether we are not to do it, and to ascertain what our powers are by our own decision, before we proceed to the consideration of others. When the proper time comes, I may have something to say upon the main subject.

Mr. DIXON. I renew the question of order which I raised, and I beg leave to read to the Chair and the Senate part of the 26th rule, which provides:

"And all other resolutions shall lie on the table one day for consideration, and also reports of committees."

Now, sir, I submit whether this resolution is not precisely in the condition of a resolution originally offered in this body, which cannot even be considered the first day on which it is offered without unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is so, but it is not yet offered. After the vote of the Senate, if the vote of the Senate shall be to proceed to its consideration, it will be precisely in the condition of a resolution offered in the Senate, and not till then.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, in any remarks that I made upon this question I hope that I was respectful. I hope, too, that I was earnest. I know no reason why I should not be; I know no reason, either, why the honorable Senator from Maine should be so exceedingly sharp about it. If he does not see fit to take my warnings, as he is pleased to call them, and if he does not see fit to care anything about me or what I say here, perhaps it would be decorous to conceal that in the Senate. I suppose that I have quite as much interest in the maintenance of the Union, and in the peace and prosperity of the country as the honorable Senator from Maine has. I do not know why I should be supposed to know as much about this question as he does, and to be as ready to take it up as he is. I have not the honor to be a member of the committee of fifteen who have charge of the condition of this Union, who carry about at their girdles the keys of the Union, at whose nod sovereign States, as I said before, wait to be admitted into the Union. But, sir, I still have some interest. I represent a State and a people in the Union. Whether I do it well or ill, it is for that people to determine when the time comes. Whether I do it honestly and fairly, or whether I do it with sinister motives and sinister purposes, it is not for the Senator from Maine to decide, but it is for the people whose representative I am upon this floor.

I agree with him, and he agrees with me, that this is a great question, the overshadowing of all questions. What did I ask, sir? Anything improper? Anything out of the way? I asked that the question may be postponed until at least we have time and opportunity to see the resolution in print, to see the length and breadth of the proposition contained in it. I think there is nothing so extraordinary in all that as that I should be subject to the denunciation (for it amounts to denunciation) of the honorable Senator from Maine. Sir, I am not to be affected by those denunciations in the slightest degree; not to be moved to the right or to the left by a hair's breadth, come from what quarter they may. When I think a great question is presented here, one involving not only the interests of the people of my State, but the people of all the States, and I may say the people the world over, what I think about it and what I have to say about it I will say, no matter what the consequences may be.

Now, we have been considering another proposition from this same committee, day after day, which I understood was to be a fundamental proposition, which was to settle and determine all these questions, which was to avenge the dead, which was to console the living, and which was to restore the country again to that peace and prosperity which it enjoyed before. Shall we continue that discussion for a day or two longer, or must this new bantling that comes from this committee of fifteen be thrust in upon us suddenly and rushed through the Senate as it has been rushed through elsewhere? I hope not. I think it is not consistent with the dignity of this body. I think it is not consistent with the notions of this body entertained by the Senator from Maine that it should be pushed upon us in a hurried manner, or that it should be hurried through. I hope it will not be. I hope he himself will not insist upon it. If he means nothing more than that this resolution shall be taken up and that it shall then go over, certainly I have no disposition to resist that upon his part; but that is not the way I have understood it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I rise to a point of order at this period of time. I am not much acquainted with the rules of order, but I believe that the subject-matter of this resolution should be placed in the form of a joint resolution, and not of a concurrent resolution, if there be a distinction between them, and under a provision of the Constitution—

"Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill."

Now, sir, although this resolution is in the form—"Resolved by the House of Representatives, the Senate concurring"—of a concurrent resolution, when the subject-matter of the resolution is inspected, when we hear it read, we see that it is such as can only be enacted either by a bill or joint resolution. I therefore raise an objection to its reception as a concurrent resolution, on the ground that the subject-matter of which it treats being the subject-matter of a joint resolution and not of a concurrent resolution, it cannot be received in this shape, and must be put in the form of a joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no difficulty in overruling the point of order. If, after the resolution is brought before the body, which it is not yet, by a vote of the Senate, it should, in their judgment, require any amendment, it will be competent in them to make such amendments as they deem proper. The Chair thinks the resolution, as coming from the House of Representatives, is to be received by the Senate; at all events, a motion to proceed to its consideration is in order; and until a vote of the Senate brings the resolution before it, the Chair certainly cannot rule it from the Senate on the ground that it is informal in its terms.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. With me the question of time, or when this resolution is to be taken up, is not material, and on that subject, as a matter of course, I have no objection to its coming up now or at any other time. But according to my recollection of the language of the resolution from its reading at the desk, there is a clause in it legislative in its character, binding not only upon this Congress, but binding upon any succeeding Congress, and of necessity the resolution must, if it passes at all, take the form of a joint resolution or of a law of Congress. We cannot by a concurrent resolution, in my judgment, undertake to carry out what is there declared. I do not rise to discuss the question now, for that would be going into the merits of the resolution and might be out of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is only proposed to take it up now, and then it will go over.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If it is understood that as soon as it is taken up it will go over, I have nothing to say.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understood the proposition of the honorable Senator from Maine to be that we take the resolution up; but it is not his purpose to have a discussion on it now, and still less his purpose to ask for a decision upon it. My understanding of the rule—and I am glad that I am confirmed in its correctness by the Chair—is that it may be taken up now, but whether it can be considered when it is taken up until the expiration of a day, under the rule, is what I rose to suggest to the honorable member. The Chair, I understand, says that if the Senate agree to take it up and an objection should then be made to its immediate consideration it will go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that if the Senate should vote to proceed to the consideration of the resolution, it will then stand under the 26th rule, subject to the objection of any Senator to being considered to-day.

Mr. JOHNSON. So I understood; and I supposed that was the view of the honorable member from Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My view is simply this: I am aware of the rule. I suppose the rule to be that any one objection can prevent its second reading to-day, if it requires a second reading. It is a concurrent resolution, and I suppose it might come within the terms of the rule. That I do not know. But unless I am prevented by the rules of the Senate, I shall ask the Senate to proceed with its consideration. If I am, I shall ask simply to have the earliest day assigned for the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. As you are, in the opinion of the Chair, prevented by the rules of the Senate from considering it to-day, there is nothing to be discussed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot help that.

Mr. JOHNSON. So I understand. Now, as to the consideration of the resolution, either at this time or at any other time when it may suit the Senate to consider it, I have no possible objection. The resolution itself has come to my knowledge to-day for the first time, not owing to any fault on the part of the committee, of which I happen to be a member, but from the circumstance of my not having been in the city at the time when the committee were deliberating on the propriety of the resolution. It has, I confess, somewhat taken me by surprise; and as I may deem it necessary, after hearing the honorable member from Maine, or those who think such a resolution should be passed, to address the Senate upon the subject, I am sure the Senate would not hasten a vote upon the question until we should all of us have an opportunity to form and to express, if we should deem it necessary, our opinion upon the subject. The Senator from Maine, I am sure, is the last man who would seek to arrest debate upon a question which he has correctly stated to be one of transcendent importance. Why it is important, how it is important, what may be its effect if adopted, or its effect if rejected, are matters about which I desire time for reflection, and I am satisfied that the Senator from Maine would not, even if he had the power, take from any Senator upon this floor the time which he might honestly and sincerely think necessary to enable him to discuss it understandingly.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I hope the vote will be taken on this subject without further debate. If the consideration of the constitutional amendment is to be proceeded with to-day, I do not desire to be pushed over into the latter portion of the session.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us take the vote on taking up this resolution, and then you can go on with your speech.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I hope there will be no further debate, and that we shall take up the resolution to amend the Constitution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question the moment debate ceases.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand that the resolution here offered is treated by the Chair under the rules, and in my judgment correctly, as a simple resolution offered to the Senate. We have that matter acted upon every day practically. The Chair announces, "Resolutions are now in order." A gentleman gets up and offers a resolution. Objection is made to it, and the objection throws it over, as a matter of course, under the 26th rule. Calling this a concurrent resolution gives it no other effect than it would have if offered simply as a resolution of the Senate. That language is adopted, I suppose, with a view to some result; it is not necessary to state it; but I think the Chair correctly suggests that this is a resolution offered in the Senate and is to be treated as a Senate resolution, and whenever it is offered to the Senate, an objection by any Senator throws over its consideration for a day.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems to me there is a wonderful sensitiveness on the part of some Senators here in advance objecting to something that is hereafter to arise. It will be time enough to determine what the resolution is when we get it before the Senate. It is a very extraordinary proceeding on the part of Senators to object when a resolution or bill comes from the House of Representatives to having it taken up. It is usually done as a matter of course. The Chair ordinarily—frequently in the midst of business—asks leave to lay before the Senate a resolution or bill from the House of Representatives. Who before ever saw Senators excited, one after another rising and wanting to know whether this can be put upon them, and what is the character of the resolution, whether it does not have to be read three times, and appealing to the Chair to know whether it is a concurrent or joint resolution, the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Kentucky equally alarmed and making common cause lest a resolution from the House of Representatives should be brought to the notice of the Senate? What would Senators have? Is it to lie here and never be considered? The proposition is to take it up, and that is all there is to it. It will be time enough to decide what it is when it is up. I think this is the first time I have ever known an objection of this kind interposed since I have been a member of the Senate. I cannot conceive what has so alarmed Senators. They certainly expect that the resolution will come up. It is entitled to come up. Usually a bill or resolution from the House of Representatives is presented to the Senate the day it is received from the House. I think the Senator from Connecticut will bear his testimony with mine that there has never been an instance since we have been members of this body where a resolution of bill from the other House was not laid before the Senate either, by the Presiding Officer or somebody else, the very day it came in. If it is forgotten, the Presiding Officer usually before we adjourn, even after a motion to adjourn is made, will ask permission to lay the bill or resolution before the Senate. This is the first time I have known such scenting afar off of some danger in a resolution. I only make these remarks to show that there can certainly be no propriety in this objection to calling up the resolution. I have nothing to say about it when it is up.

Mr. DIXON. The Senate will remember that the honorable Senator from Maine stated to the Senate that his object was to have immediate action upon this resolution unless some rule of the Senate should prevent it. Now, the Senator from Illinois asks, what do we desire? What do we want? Why this eager anxiety to prevent immediate action upon the resolution? Sir, this is not the case of an ordinary bill or resolution from the House of Representatives, coming here to be considered and referred by general consent. It is a very different case from that. Here is a very important measure. Certainly Senators ought to have the privilege of reading it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before it is taken up?

Mr. DIXON. Before it is considered. What did I do? When the motion was under consideration to act upon it at once, and two or three speeches had been made, I barely called the attention of the Chair to the 26th rule, partly to prevent the consumption of time. And now the Senator says, why scent this danger in advance as if something very uncommon had been done? Why, sir, in my judgment, with deference to the Chair, whenever bills or resolutions come from the House of Representatives, and are acted upon at once by the Senate, it is by general consent. I of course am mistaken if the Chair differs from me, but by my reading of this rule the Senate cannot act on a resolution of any description in any manner on the first day on which it is presented. If the Senator from Illinois presents a resolution and asks immediate action upon it, what do we do in such a case? We read it for information. The Senate will not even allow it to be read except for information; and why? Because this rule provides that all resolutions shall lie on the table one day for consideration. I supposed that that rule applied to this resolution. Of course I am wrong if I differ from the Chair, but my only object was to have the rule of the Senate enforced.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe there is no question before the body except that this resolution shall be taken up and then laid aside.

Several SENATORS. That is all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It will not be laid aside unless the rules require it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This is a very interesting proceeding. We propose to take it up and then lay it down. Now, suppose we do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Several SENATORS. Let the call be withdrawn.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be withdrawn by common consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of the resolution named. The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. DIXON. I now submit to the Chair that under the 26th rule, which provides that all other resolutions except those specified shall lie on the table for one day for consideration, this resolution cannot be acted upon without unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. CLARK. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will not object to an order to print the resolution.

Mr. DIXON. I do not object to that.

Mr. CLARK. Let it be printed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not understand whether the Senator from Connecticut objects to the consideration of the resolution or not.

Mr. DIXON. I do object.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well, then; if, under the ruling of the Chair, it must go over, I move that it be made the special order for Friday next at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that a motion on the resolution cannot be entertained. An objection to it carries it over, and to fix a day for its consideration is considering the resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I give notice that I shall call it up on Friday at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over under the rule.

PRESERVATION OF ORDER IN THE GALLERY.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the consent of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKALEW,] who I believe is entitled the floor, I desire to offer a resolution to promote the order of the Senate, to which I hope there will be no objection. If there is objection to it as a matter of course it will go over:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby instructed to arrest, without further order, any person who by applause or dissent in the gallery shall disturb the order of the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply desire to say that I have noticed that the disturbance of the order of the Senate is generally started by one or two persons, and that we have put a great many orderly citizens to inconvenience by clearing the galleries. My own impression is that the messengers in charge of the different doors can very easily arrest any disturbance in the galleries by observing this resolution and arresting the first person who commits a violation of order and bringing him to the bar of the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. You do not state in the resolution what he shall do with him.

Mr. SHERMAN. That must be subject to the order of the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. Why not say so in the resolution, that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall hold the person arrested subject to the order of the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. If he arrests him, as a matter of course he will hold him subject to the orders of the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. You had better put it in the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to any amendment that will carry out the desired object.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend the resolution by adding the words, "and hold him subject to the order of the Senate."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Ohio assents to the amendment. The resolution is under his control, and that amendment will be made.

Mr. CLARK. I approve of the object of this resolution, but I think this whole matter ought to be under the control of the Presiding Officer, and that he should direct the Sergeant-at-Arms when to make the arrest. It is the duty of the Presiding Officer to preserve the order of the Senate, and if it is the sense of the Senate, as expressed in this resolution, that he should do it in this way, he would undoubtedly do it, and that would be the proper way of doing it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Presiding Officer of the Senate is not always in the chair. Different Senators occupy the chair during the day, and it is not their business to attend to this matter. I think it had better be left to the Sergeant-at-Arms, who is charged with the duty of preserving the order of the Senate. He has messengers and agents scattered in different parts of the building, and they can promptly and readily, without awaiting the order of the Presiding Officer, arrest any person making a disturbance. It will always be in the power of the Senate to control the whole matter.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that the Sergeant-at-Arms is much more frequently absent than the Presiding Officer, and it will not do to leave the messengers at the doors to arrest anybody they choose. I should not like to do that. Let the Presiding Officer give instructions to do it when it is done.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no danger of abuse under this resolution, because the person arrested would be at once brought to the bar of the Senate, and we would dispose of the matter promptly. No person's rights will be affected by it. The Sergeant-at-Arms acts through his deputies, and any person authorized to do so by the Sergeant-at-Arms would be authorized to make arrests. He would act, as a matter of course, through his doorkeepers and messengers. The person arrested would be brought to the bar of the Senate. I do not believe, myself, that there will be any necessity for making arrests. Citizens who come here to listen to our debates ought to be warned that if they violate the order of the Senate, especially after the repeated violations we have had here lately, they are liable to be arrested, and to be held subject to the order of the Senate. I submitted the resolution after I drew it up to several Senators, and they made no objection to it, and I hope, therefore, it will be adopted.

Mr. GRIMES. I concur with the Senator from Ohio that this authority ought to be vested in the Sergeant-at-Arms, who can place his various officers at the several doors. A recent major general, one of the bravest in our Army, was telling me about his being turned out of the gallery here one day this week, when there were only eight or ten who made any disturbance, some of whom cheered, and some hissed. He was listening very patiently to a speech that was being made. He referred the messenger to one man, and said to him, "There is a man that cheered, and there is another one that hissed, take them, and let me sit here; I have not disturbed anybody." In such cases as that, the Sergeant-at-Arms, or his deputies, ought to arrest those men and bring them before the Senate, and let the other persons who have been quiet, and come here for the purpose of listening to the debates, remain. The President of the Senate cannot specify these particular men who are thus disturbing the peace of the Senate, and before he can issue orders to the Sergeant-at-Arms to arrest them, they will have escaped, or passed from his observation. The resolution was adopted.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of the joint resolution proposing to amend the Constitution.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SUMNER. With the indulgence of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I should like to say that there is important public business in executive session which ought to be acted on to-day. I shall not make the motion now, of course, while the Senator has the floor, but I give notice that I hope the Senate will allow me to move an executive session as soon as the Senator from Pennsylvania has finished his speech.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I shall not speak to-day as a party man, nor as a sectional man, but as an American, as a citizen of the United States anxious to maintain its unity, and to promote, so far as my humble efforts can do it, the welfare of our common country. I have looked forward during the weary months of the recent war to a time when a new class of subjects would arise for our consideration. The discussion of measures of force in the prosecution of the war and the discussion of the various questions connected with the subject of slavery did not provoke me upon any single occasion to address the Senate at length. Returning from a foreign country after the commencement of the war, when it was in full progress, and when no human power could avert the storm which fell upon us, I found myself, as did most of the citizens of our country, absolutely controlled by the circumstances which surrounded us and which pressed us forward upon a course of conduct which we could not avoid. I thought then, and I think now, that there was but one thing to do. We were engaged in a contest which was, as it has been often described, a contest of life and death, and there was nothing to be done except to fight it out, to fight on, to promote or assist the collision of forces which were then arrayed against each other until some ultimate result should be reached.

As a member of the minority in this Chamber, I gave my vote for those measures of the majority which directly pointed to the use of the force of this Government to subjugate the insurrection which raised its head against us. I was opposed to the political policy of that majority, and have continued to entertain and evince that opposition down to this time in a respectful and proper manner. But upon the question of prosecuting the war to a conclusion, I never had any difficulty, I never had any hesitation. Upon an examination of my record—and humble as it may be, even it may by some persons at some time be examined—it will be found that from the time I assumed the seat to which my State had assigned me in this Chamber, my course was such as I have indicated, and was in exact accordance with the convictions that I held.

I thought that there was little to be attained by speech-making by a member, even from the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, upon political questions during the war. While the passions of the country were inflamed by the war, reason could not be heard. Logic is thrown away upon the passions. It can only be heard after they have subsided. But, sir, I looked forward to the days through which we are now passing, contemplating a condition of things entirely changed, the coming up of new questions, especially questions connected with economy, with revenue, with finance, with ordinary legislation, with the administration of justice wherever the jurisdiction of this Government extends—all those questions which require intelligence, which require investigation, which require labor, the habits of the student. I looked forward to that class of questions, intending to speak upon them on fit and proper occasions, and when, in my opinion, I might contribute something useful to the current of your debates.

But there was one thing which I did not anticipate. I did not anticipate that nearly one year after the termination of the war, one year after the great armies which were arrayed against us had submitted to our power and had capitulated to our forces in the field, nearly a year after open resistance to our authority had terminated, and when in point of fact there was no resistance to the Government of the United States in any portion of our country, we, in the Congress of the United States, should be discussing the question of whether the war had been a success or not, whether our country was, as formerly, entire and complete, a unit under the Constitution of the United States, no longer broken and severed into parts, but one homogeneous whole, united together by the fundamental law, the Constitution established by our fathers. I did not anticipate the necessity of debating subjects of this description, because I could not foresee either the passions or interests of party which precipitate upon us the questions out of which these debates arise. But, sir, these subjects are here, and they are to be met, and it is because with reference to some of these questions I have not heard my own ideas presented by others, that I now trespass upon the attention of the Senate and pray their attention for a brief time.

Among the other subjects which are brought before us by this celebrated committee of fifteen, which seems to have taken charge to a great extent of the affairs of the Government, which seems to have assumed to itself the functions of Congress and the functions also of an advisory body to the Executive—among the other subjects thrown into Congress for the operation of the previous question in the House of Representatives and for the prompt lash of party discipline in the Senate, is the subject of representation in this Government, one that has undergone no consideration, or very slight consideration, from the year 1789, when the Constitution of the United States went into operation, to this day. We have talked about everything else, we have considered everything else except this great subject, because we supposed that representation in this Government had been established upon just and proper foundations by our fathers. We were content with their work. We took it for granted that they had made a proper arrangement in that portion of the Constitution which related to this subject. But the committee of fifteen have introduced to our attention a resolution proposing a limitation upon the representation of the States of this Union in the House of Representatives in all cases where the right of suffrage shall be abridged by such State as to any class of its inhabitants on account of race or color.

The resolution of the committee raises one of the questions which we are now to consider. That resolution had a swift passage through the House of Representatives, but here it has had a somewhat prolonged consideration, and it is well that it has been considered, because as the debate has progressed more and more of opposition to it has been manifested, and more and more plainly have appeared to the Senate and the people of the country who read our debates the imperfections of the plan of amendment proposed by that resolution.

Mr. President, I shall speak to-day upon the subject of representation of States in this Senate, and of the people of States in the House of Representatives; and the particular questions examined will be—

1. The senatorial representation of the eastern States;
2. The present admission of Senators and Representatives from the South;
3. The proposed amendment of the Constitution, limiting representation in the House of Representatives in future.

The provisions of the Constitution of the United States which will come under review in our present inquiry, are the three following; all to be found in the first article:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote."—Section 3, clause 1.

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."—Section 2, clause 1.

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons."—Same section, clause 3.

These provisions, regulating representation in the Government of the United States, have remained unchanged from the formation of the Constitution down to this day, or for more than seventy-five years. Shall they continue to stand, or shall they be changed? That question must now be met and answered, for the committee of fifteen has proposed, and the House of Representatives has passed, a resolution proposing a material change in one of these clauses; and other changes have been proposed in both Houses, and are now pending; and for the time being Congress declines or delays to execute these clauses of the Constitution so far as they relate to the representation of southern States.

I shall speak, in the first place, of the representation of the eastern States in the Senate; for although this subject has not been raised directly by any bill or resolution presented in either House, or been referred to in debate in either House, so far as I have observed, it is intimately connected with the questions which have been raised, and which are undergoing public debate.

REPRESENTATION OF THE EAST IN THE SENATE.

The six States beyond the Hudson river, commonly called "New England," have twelve Senators on this floor by virtue of that clause of the Constitution relating to senatorial representation which I have read. Each State is to have two Senators—neither more nor less—without any regard to the number of inhabitants it may contain. And by the concluding clause of the fifth article of the Constitution, relating to amendments, it is provided that—

"No State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

By referring to the census of 1860, the population of the eastern States is found to be as follows:

EASTERN STATES.
Maine.....	628,279
New Hampshire.....	326,073
Massachusetts.....	1,231,066
Rhode Island.....	174,620
Connecticut.....	460,147
Vermont.....	315,098
Total.....	3,135,283

Six States with twelve Senators.

Dividing this total of population by the number twelve, will show the number of inhabitants to each Senator upon an equal apportionment according to numbers. The resulting ratio or number for a Senator will be found to be 261,273. In other words, there is one Senator to each 261,273 inhabitants. It requires a little over a quarter of a million persons in the East (the whole population there being considered in the computation) for one Senator in this body.

Having thus ascertained the ratio of apportionment for the East, let us ascertain what it will be for the other States represented in the Senate and which adhered to our Government during the war. Their population in 1860 was as follows:

CENTRAL AND WESTERN STATES.
New York.....	3,880,735
New Jersey.....	672,035
Pennsylvania.....	2,906,215
Delaware.....	112,216
Maryland.....	687,049
West Virginia.....	349,698
Ohio.....	2,339,511
Michigan.....	749,113
Indiana.....	1,350,428
Illinois.....	1,711,951
Kentucky.....	1,155,684
Missouri.....	1,182,012
Wisconsin.....	775,881
Iowa.....	674,913
Minnesota.....	172,023
Kansas.....	107,206
California.....	379,994
Oregon.....	52,465
Total.....	19,259,129

Here are eighteen States with thirty-six Senators, and dividing their whole population by the number thirty-six will show a ratio for one Senator of 534,976. It requires, therefore, more than half a million inhabitants in those States for one vote in the Senate.

For the purpose of further comparison let us next turn to the States of the South, which are now unrepresented in Congress. Their population in 1860 was as follows:

SOUTHERN STATES.
Virginia.....	1,246,620
North Carolina.....	992,622
South Carolina.....	703,708
Georgia.....	1,057,286
Florida.....	140,424
Alabama.....	804,201
Mississippi.....	791,305
Tennessee.....	1,109,801
Louisiana.....	708,002
Arkansas.....	435,450
Texas.....	604,215
Total.....	8,753,634

Here are eleven States with twenty-two Senators, and dividing their total population by twenty-two, there results a ratio or number to each Senator of 397,892. I have deducted from the population of Virginia the population of the forty-eight counties which were, under the name of West Virginia, admitted into the Union as a new State by the act of 31st of December, 1862.

The new State, with its proper number of inhabitants, appears in the table of the central States already given, inasmuch as it was represented in the last Congress.

Let us now consolidate these totals of population in the several divisions of the country, as just given, to obtain a common ratio of distribution:

Six eastern States.....	3,135,283
Eighteen central and western States.....	19,259,129
Eleven southern States.....	8,753,634
Total.....	31,148,046

Here are thirty-five States in all, with seventy Senators, and by dividing their total population by the number seventy, we obtain a common ratio for the whole country of 444,972.

We are now prepared for a comparison of eastern representation with that of other sections upon exact data. The Territories, not being represented, are excluded from the calculation, as is also the State of Nevada, which was not represented during the war.

But it is to be remembered that as the new States of the West increase much more rapidly in population than the old Atlantic States, the inequality between the East and the central and western sections is now greater than it was in 1860, when the census was taken.

But upon the figures as now stated, the case will sum up as follows:

RATIOS FOR A SENATOR.
For the eastern States.....	261,273
For central and western States.....	534,976
For southern States.....	397,892
Common ratio.....	444,972

Deducting the ratio of New England from the common ratio for the whole Union will show a deficient population in the former, upon each Senator allowed her, of no less than 183,699; and multiplying this deficiency upon one Senator by twelve (the whole number of her Senators) will show a total deficiency to the enormous extent of 2,204,388, that is, she has representation in this Senate for nearly two and a quarter million persons who are actually located in the central and western States.

But, astonishing as these figures are, they do not exhibit the full extent of the inequality which now exists with the South unrepresented. The population of all the States is taken into account to produce the result just stated. But drawing the comparison between her and the central and western States, actually represented here, will show her deficiency in population greater than before by 258,936, or a total deficiency of 2,463,324. These two and a half million people exist. They are not a myth—not imaginary persons—but real, breathing men, women, and children in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, and Missouri. They are found along the Hudson and the Mohawk, by the Susquehanna, the Wabash, and the Ohio. And the men among them are a main support of this nation, bearing its industries forward and abiding by its laws. They turn the furrow in the field, or push the plane in the workshop, or smite the anvil in the smithy, or dig fuel from the bowels of the earth, or build great towns and smiling hamlets throughout the great States of the center and the West. Not one of them is found in the East, though men of the East vote for them in this Senate. Not a dollar of fishing bounties wrung from an impoverished Treasury ever reached them in its disbursement. They have been content to receive justice rather than favor from Government; their patriotism has been spontaneous, constant, and sure, without calculation of immediate advantage, and with no shrewd calculation of future profit or dominion.

When, therefore, the readjustment of representation in this Government is proposed; when Congress and the country are considering propositions of amendment and of change in the basis of political power, I insist that their views and interests shall be taken into account rather than those which exist in a section which has been, heretofore, favored at their expense if not to their injury.

But, before suggesting any change in the senatorial representation of the East, or showing the connection which exists between the inequality already described and the question of southern representation in Congress, it will be instructive and useful to illustrate eastern influence in the Government (resulting from her senatorial representation) by some pertinent examples.

That influence is shown in the selection of Presiding Officers of the Senate. For four years from the 4th of March, 1861, an eastern Vice President occupied the chair at the opening of sessions and occasionally afterward, with the power of the casting vote. He was chosen by the people. But the officer who usually presides over our deliberations—the President pro tempore—is selected by the Senate itself, and, in selecting him, the power of the East is manifested. All our Presiding Officers recently have been from that quarter; in the Thirty-Seventh Congress the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. Foor;] in the Thirty-Eighth Congress the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK;] and in the present Congress, the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FOSTER.] In brief, the East has held the chair of the Senate during the whole war, and holds it now. Her grasp upon it has not been released for a moment, and still continues.

In caucuses or consultations of the majority, where very often the course of action in open session is determined; where the laws of party discipline are applied to crush out dissent and to overrule individual judgment, it is most evident that the twelve voices from the East must be very potential. But upon this point I must speak with some prudent reserve. The mysteries of the caucus-room are shut off from direct observation; and my curiosity is circumscribed by the limits of the possible. As I cannot know what occurs in those secret consultations I shall not speculate much upon them, and shall limit my remarks on this point to the general inference concerning eastern influence which naturally arises.

I pass to another point which is not obscure, the facts of which are open and known, or may be known, to all. I mean the constitution of committees, and particularly the selection of their chairmen. The Congressional Directory, just published, shows twenty-three standing committees of the Senate, and three joint ones established in connection with the House. Among them the following have eastern chairmen: Foreign Relations, Mr. Sumner, of Massachusetts; Finance, Mr. Fessenden, of Maine; Manufactures, Mr. Sprague, of Rhode Island; Military Affairs and Militia, Mr. Wilson, of Massachusetts; Post Offices and Post Roads, Mr. Dixon, of Connecticut; Claims, Mr. Clark, of New Hampshire; District of Columbia, Mr. Morrill, of Maine; Public Buildings and Grounds, Mr. Foot, of Vermont.

These are all standing committees. Of the three joint committees, that on Printing has for its chairman Mr. Anthony, of Rhode Island. The general result is, that while the population of the East is less than one seventh of the population of the States represented in the Senate, she has the chairmanships of one third of the committees, including the leading ones. The case was still stronger in the last Congress.

I observed, at one time, that of the twenty-eight joint, standing, and select committees then organized, fourteen, or one half the whole number, had New England chairmen. At the same time the great State of New York had none, and my own State a single one—that on Patents. Let us contemplate the figures which apply here for a moment:

Population of eastern States.....	3,135,283
Population of Pennsylvania.....	2,906,215
Population of New York.....	3,880,735

The East, with her three million, had the control of fourteen committees out of the twenty-eight, New York none, and Pennsylvania the Committee on Patents. Well, sir, New York has since been promoted in the senatorial scale. One of her Senators at the present session has been assigned to the head of the Committee on Private Land Claims. I am not sure that that committee ever meets, but it is displayed in the list of committees in elegant type, doubtless very much to the satisfaction of the good people of the Empire State, who are thus honored through their representative.

As to the Committee on Patents, I look upon it with special affection. I have a faint recollection that some bill was reported from it at a former session; but my particular interest in it arises from the fact that it was assigned to my State as her particular post of honor during the war. Massachusetts took charge of Foreign Relations, Military Affairs, and Slavery and the Treatment of Freedmen. Post Offices and Post Roads and Public Buildings were in charge of Vermont; Connecticut attended to Pensions and matters in this District; New Hampshire had charge of the Navy and Claims; Maine looked after the Finances, while little Rhode Island burdened herself with the subject of Manufactures and the subject of Public Printing. Thus there was an engrossment by those States of the leadership of most of the committees which commanded effective power, patronage, and influence. But it is refreshing for a man from my own State to reflect that she was not altogether overlooked. Her modest claims received due recognition, and the position then assigned her she yet retains. Sir, whenever the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, shall marshal the Senate committees in military array as a home guard, in defense of the Capitol, each with its appropriate organization, there, in the midst of that patriotic throng, will be seen the stalwart form of my colleague bearing aloft in proud defiance the banner of the Committee on Patents!

Mr. President, the chairmanship of a committee is a position of much influence and power. The several distinguished gentlemen holding that position have virtual control over the transaction of business, both in committee and in the Senate. Each one has also control of a committee-room, and the services of a competent clerk, not only for public business but for conducting private correspondence, and for the various other labors imposed upon a Senator by his station.

I will say here, in view of complaints made in the country, that I consider the employment as clerk of a son or other relative by a chairman as wholly unobjectionable. The relation of clerk and chairman is both confidential and intimate, and hence such clerkship is quite unlike any other office which may be filled by senatorial influence. A President of the United States may very properly employ his son as private secretary, and it has been the practice from the foundation of our Government for our ministers sent abroad, among whom have been the most distinguished and able men of the country, to take their sons with them as secretaries of legation.

The newspaper criticisms which have been directed against the employment of young gentlemen as clerks of committees who are related by ties of family or blood to chairmen are wholly misapplied. Nepotism, the appointment of relations to office, or the obtaining their appointment by the use of one's official influence, is justly odious, and should always be denounced as of evil example and corruptive tendency. But an appointment to private and confidential service or to duties which involve such service is not within the general objection, and is justified by the opinions and practice of the best of men.

Mr. President, the burden of correspondence and of other business, independent of ordinary legislative duties, thrown upon members from populous States is very great. Their time is consumed and their exertions expended upon various matters outside of public business transacted in the Senate. Their time for study and proper legislative labor is thus curtailed, and they are likely to be overtaken by the multifarious duties which press upon them.

Now, it is evident that in the last Congress, by the distribution of a dozen clerks or more among the twelve New England Senators, they obtained an amount of assistance which removed from them a great part of the labor they would otherwise have borne, and enabled them to act with more efficiency and influence in their high office. But these advantages were not enjoyed by a large part of the members from other States to whom their allowance would have been more reasonable.

I know it may be said that many of the oldest members of the Senate, possessing fitness for chairmanships, are from the East. The same explanation was made in behalf of the South in former years when she was charged with engrossing too many positions of influence here. But the explanation is insufficient in the present case, as it was in the former, and besides it does not meet the main point of my argument, which is that the East is over-represented.

The over-representation of the East, and her consequent undue power in this Senate, must be taken into account by any one who would correctly understand past or present action in Congress and in the Government.

In the Thirty-Eighth Congress the Senate consisted of forty-nine members, including one from Virginia. By a resolution adopted by the Senate a quorum of the body for the transaction of business was declared to be a majority of the members from adhering States; in other words, a majority of members elected and admitted to seats.

Membership from insurgent States was wholly excluded from the computation. Twenty-five members, therefore, constituted a quorum for the transaction of business, and thirteen constituted a majority of that quorum. In other words, it was a possible case that a law should be enacted by the twelve eastern votes with a single vote added to them from all the rest of the Union. So nearly had the East approached complete control in this body!

Nevada has since been admitted into the Union, and is represented here by two Senators. A quorum under the resolution just mentioned is therefore at present twenty-six. If Colorado should be admitted as a State and her Senators to seats here, the quorum would be twenty-seven; but whether Colorado be admitted or not, the number of votes required to constitute a majority of the quorum under the existing resolution would be barely fourteen, requiring, to secure it, but two votes to be added to the vote of the East; and yet the whole population of the East is less than one seventh of the population of the States represented here!

It would require much more time than is at my command, and much more inclination for the task than I possess, to describe the effect upon the legislation of the country of the pre-dominance of the East. But I will mention two subjects which clearly illustrate it.

First, the fishing bounties, or donations of money from the Treasury of the United States to men along our northeastern coast, engaged in the fisheries of the ocean. This money is bestowed under pretense of encouraging the training and making of seamen; and the annual expenditure for the purpose amounts to three or four hundred thousand dollars. The whole amount heretofore expended exceeds twenty-five million dollars. This is the most questionable of all our appropriations of public money, and it would long since have been stopped—the laws authorizing it swept from the statute-book—if the disbursement were made in any other section of the country except the East. The enormous political power of that section has maintained these bounties in existence, and was found sufficient to maintain them even during the severest financial pressure of the war.

Take, next, the third section of the supplementary conscription act of July 4, 1864, by which the agents of States were authorized to go into the southern country and procure enlistments of men, white or black, to fill their quotas under the conscription laws. It was material to the East to retain her laborers at home to maintain her industrial interests and general prosperity, notwithstanding the war. Accompanying this measure was another for the payment of liberal bounties by the United States, to meet the outlays of which the celebrated special five per cent. income tax was imposed. I need not recite the proceedings upon these measures—the debates and votes connected with their passage. The East triumphed throughout. Voted down or repulsed upon more than one occasion, she rallied her strength, and by persistence secured her objects.

We were coolly informed upon one occasion that if we did not assent to one of these propositions, the Massachusetts members in the House had determined to defeat, and would defeat, the whole of an important public bill in which it was contained. Of course, the point was conceded, and perfect harmony reigned over the concluding hours of a great session.

Very active and energetic efforts in obtaining recruits in other States of the North, negro recruits in the South, and foreign emigrants, enabled the East to fill her quotas without exhausting her laboring population at home, in consequence of which, in connection with the expansion of the currency secured by her votes, the dividends of her manufacturing companies became splendid, and her profits in furnishing Government supplies immense.

Her recruitment of southern negroes to fill her quotas was checked the following year by the repeal of the section authorizing it, upon a motion submitted by me.

There was a prolonged contest over the question of repeal, but for once there was a sufficient force rallied to overcome the eastern interest. One fact shown in the debate may be again mentioned. No sooner had the news been flashed North by telegraph that General Sherman had captured Savannah, than agents were dispatched by Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, to enlist all the negroes that could be obtained at that point. Having done this, he applied to the Secretary of War for permission to his agents to go South and make the enlistments; and the computation of time was made with such exactness that it was believed the permission from the Secretary would reach Savannah precisely at the time when the negroes should be shipped North. Enterprise and smartness are fine things in times of war as well as in times of peace, and influence with Government opens a fine field for their exercise, as in the case in question.

It might be interesting to go on in this connection and examine the tariff acts and internal revenue laws which have been passed since 1860, and to show that in the particular arrangements made of duties and taxes the East received more than her due share of consideration and favor. But why multiply proofs that political power will always seek its own ends, and give such direction to Government as shall be, or be thought to be, favorable to its own interests? Look over the whole field of Government policy, whether political, sectional, or economical, and you will discover the marks of eastern power in every part. And by its alliance with, or rather mastership of, a great political party of the North, it is at this moment almost omnipotent in the Government.

Sir, the East controlled the Senate during the war, as she controls it now, and by virtue of that control she has dominated the House of Representatives and influenced powerfully and constantly the executive department. Her power here has been, in fact, a power over the whole Government, and when considered in its totality has been enormous and irresistible. Necessarily, the action of the House of Representatives has had reference to the action of the Senate whenever the concurrence of the latter in any measure was necessary. Besides, the House is frequently filled with new men, while the Senate, on account of the long duration of senatorial terms, and of frequent reelection of its members, is less subject to change. For this reason, and because of its participation with the President in the distribution of offices, and in the formation of treaties, the Senate must possess a larger measure of influence than the House, and must extend more of influence to that body than it receives from it. For the same reasons, and for others equally obvious, the influence of the Senate over the executive branch of the Government (especially when the President is united by party bonds with a Senate majority) must be very considerable. In the case of Mr. Lincoln this influence was an important force in giving direction to executive policy and conduct. He complained sometimes of the "pressure" brought to bear upon him, but sooner or later he always submitted to it, and performed its behests. And unquestionably the same eastern power hopes ultimately to obtain from the present President an equal degree of acquiescence in its present and future demands. It is enthroned here; it grasps firmly the scepter of authority, and has no intention to abdicate its functions or surrender any portion of its power. Intrenched, as it believes, firmly and forever within the Constitution as to its senatorial representation, it is unwilling to weaken that representative power by the admission of members from the South. It resists the admission of members even from Colorado and Tennessee, and bases its opposition to increased representation upon grounds which must long continue to exist. And if representation must hereafter be conceded to southern States and to new States, she desires the concession to be made upon condition of negro suffrage. The protégés of her policy, the objects of her long continued agitation of the country, however unfit or unworthy of the elective franchise, are to be endowed with it as her political allies for the future.

Mr. President, it is in human nature that power once held or wielded should be surrendered unwillingly. The individual who has held high office very commonly retires from it with reluctance and under the pressure of some constitutional or popular power which he cannot resist. And thus, also, great sectional or social interests yield power unwillingly, and when compelled to do so bitterly regret the sacrifice. It required the stroke of war to loosen the grasp of the slaveholder upon his slave; he surrenders his power only when compelled by overwhelming force.

A manufacturing or agricultural population, protected by the most extravagant of tariffs or by the most oppressive of corn laws, will never willingly yield their power over markets and consumers. Political interests stronger than they must wrest from them the advantages which they possess if they are ever to be deprived of their enjoyment.

No one, therefore, need be surprised at the reluctance manifested by the East to surrender any portion of the power which she has held during the war, and now holds, in the Government. In this particular she but exhibits another illustration of that characteristic of human nature which I have mentioned, and which, outside the breasts of saints and heroes, is universal. Twenty-two Senators from the southern States and two from Colorado—being double the number of those from the East—would reduce the importance of the latter in the Senate and remit her back to the condition in which she stood in her relations to the Union before the war. True, she would even then possess much more than her proportion of weight in the Senate, regard being had to her population, but she would no longer dominate or control the Government of the United States. A balance of power in the Union, utterly broken by secession and war, would be restored, and existing interests in all sections of the country would be heard in Congress, and be regarded in the enactment of laws. And the effects of this change would be felt in the executive and judicial branches of the Government. The principles of the Constitution would waken to a new life. Justice and tolerance would return to the councils of the Government and to the hearts of the people. Public expenditures would be diminished, along with the pretended necessities which now create or excuse them. Trade would revive, production increase, and the public credit be established upon a sure foundation. More than this, we would stand strong before the nations of the earth by being made thoroughly secure against their secret intrigues or open hostility.

Mr. President, I do not dislike or despise New England. I am content to acknowledge her merits, to deal justly by her people, and even to overlook in some degree what I conceive to be her errors of opinion and extravagancies of conduct. The man of the East is industrious, enterprising, and thrifty; his ingenuity is remarkable, and his achievements in the pursuits of private life and in public employment constitute a prominent part of the national history. He has reclaimed the forest and the prairie to the uses of man; has been active in educational improvement and in establishing a literature which, however defective, gives promise of future excellence. He has been a producer of wealth, and his activity has been a great element of national force and of national progress. And he has won distinction upon the ocean as well as upon the land, not only in naval conflicts in the late war, and still more in former wars, but also in the pursuits of peaceful commerce. He carries our flag over great seas, to distant islands, and to the uttermost parts of the earth. He drops the line as a patient fisherman off the Newfoundland banks, or follows, with poised spear, the walrus and the whale among the icebergs of the North. A hundred years ago the enterprise and thrift of the New England mariner was celebrated by Edmund Burke in language that will never die:

"No sea but what is vexed by their fisheries."

By the way, sir, that excellent word vexed—excellent in the connection in which it is used—I once thought was a scintillation of the fine genius of Burke himself. I thought so until I remembered that the great master before him had written about

"The vexed Bermoothes."

Sir, the passage is to be found in the Tempest.

Protesting, then, that I am not prompted by antipathy or jealousy toward the East, I proceed to mention the remedial measures which will remove the inequality complained of, or at least reduce it within tolerable bounds. The first remedy will be what has already been suggested, the admission of Senators into the Senate from the eleven States of the South; for by increasing the whole number of members in the Senate the existing inequality will sink in relative importance. Though it will not disappear, it will be less potent and pernicious than at present. The second and more effectual remedy will be an amendment of the Constitution readjusting senatorial representation upon a more just basis. Let it be provided that States containing less than one million inhabitants shall have one Senator; States containing more than one million and less than three millions, two Senators; and States containing more than three millions, three Senators. This arrangement will make representation in the Senate much more equal and satisfactory than it now is, and ought not to meet with objection in any quarter. It will make three classes of States, each class having representation somewhat in proportion to its relative importance in the Union, while the State basis for senatorial representation, one of the best features of our constitutional system, will be retained in complete integrity.

Premising that I shall recur to this point hereafter, I will now proceed to the second division of my subject, the question of

RECONSTRUCTION.

I use this term as including two points: first, the reorganization of southern State governments; and second, the admission of southern Senators and Representatives into Congress. This last point involves one of the remedies for eastern predominance in the Senate, already mentioned.

I was one of those who thought the provisional governments set up in the South under Mr. Lincoln's Administration were legitimate and proper. But I regarded them in a very different light from that in which they appeared
